One of the finest passages in all history occurred when Louis Kossuth, speaking of his representative relation to Hungary, with the iron heel of her oppressor right on her burning heart, and while the ghosts of the martyrs of his fatherland were stalking before his soul, said: "The woes of millions of Magyars are in my heart!" Yet how even this sublime posture dwindles into insignificance when compared with the posture of Him who, in the high and peculiar sense, bore in his great heart the woes of men in multitudes like the sands of the seashore, the leaves of the wild woods, or the clustered stars of the midnight firmament! When I see Jesus disrobing himself of the splendor of Godhead, and becoming the babe of Bethlehem, my soul exclaims, Wondrous stoop! When I see him, "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," in his pathway of benediction to men, I say, Amazing condescension! But when I see him suffering keenly in spirit under the vile indignities which were heaped upon him, and for me, even for my sake, muffling up his anguish under scorns and scoffs, buffetings and blows, despising the shame, trampling under his feet the dishonors done him, that with his stripes I might be healed—when I see him yielding up himself to such august agony that his heart was rent with a storm of spasms, I say:

O Lamb of God, was ever pain,
Was ever love like thine?

Was there ever, can there ever be, a more powerful address to the noble affections of men than is given us in the breaking heart and in the speaking blood of Jesus?

Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands my heart, my life, my all.

THE HUDSON-FULTON PAGEANT

The Largest Fleet Ever Gathered in American Waters at the New York Celebration

MORE beautiful than any scene conjured up by the writers of The Arabian Nights, more filled with pageantry than any tournament of the Middle Ages, were the illuminations and the parades which delighted the eyes of the vast multitudes who visited New York City during the Hudson-Fulton celebration. Nothing like it has been seen before, declare men who have made the preparation of historical celebrations a study; nothing like it will be seen again probably until the memory of the Hudson-Fulton week has become dim.

The Hudson-Fulton celebration was of such significance not only to all the States of our own country, but to foreign nations as well, that the guns of the warships of Great Britain, of Germany, of France, of Holland, of Italy, and of many other European and American countries boomed in unison with the salutes of fifty-three vessels of our own fighting fleet as, on the 25th of September, the Half Moon and the Clermont sailed up between their smoking lines. It was an occasion to stir the blood, and hundreds of thousands felt their veins tingle, their hearts beat high, as in parade and float, in illumination and in historic dedications, the history of three centuries of America—the objective point of the discoverer, the land of the thirteen colonies, and of forty-five prosperous States—was unfolded before their gaze.

Medal of Henry Hudson

Of course it was a manifest impossibility that every visitor could see all of the different events, it would have taken weeks to do so; but those who came felt well repaid for time and trouble, and in days to come they will date things from the time "when we went to the Hudson-Fulton celebration."

The week before the first naval parade on the 25th of September was as busy a one as New York City has put in for many a day. Everywhere electric lights were being put up—on the dizzy heights of the Brooklyn and other bridges which span the East River, over every prominent point of the public buildings until at night they appeared like structures made of fire, on most of the business buildings, on private dwellings, and on posts along Broadway and Fifth Avenue, where they soon turned night into day. Up by the new Public Library on Fifth Avenue, near Forty-second Street, workmen toiled like beavers as one snowy pillar after another was put in place to form the great triumphal Court of Honor through which the marching hosts would pass.

The decorations of the city were dazzling in their color and profusion. Every one seemed to be the proud possessor of a Hudson-Fulton celebration flag; and duplicates of the yellow, white and blue banner under which Hudson himself sailed flaunted gaily from every store front and from most of the private houses.

Early on the morning of the 25th, the opening day, people began to make their way to points of vantage along the green shores of Staten Island, on the slopes of Bay Ridge opposite, and at every pier and open space along the Hudson on the New York side and on the Palisades on the Jersey shore. Boats of all sizes, from the great excursion steamer which carried several thousand down to the fussy little tugs and launches, were steaming to some spot where they could anchor on the line of the naval parade. What a sight it was that met the eyes of the onlookers! In river and harbor alike there swung at their anchors, like war-dogs anxious to be released, the finest battleships and cruisers of the United States—gray, grim, imposing, with a bristle of guns at side, on deck and in turret. In the fleet were sixteen great battleships, under the command of Rear-Admiral Schroeder, who had as his flagship the Connecticut. There were the black hulls of Great Britain's squadron, from the peak of whose flagship, the Inflexible, fluttered the pennant of that intrepid British tar, Sir Henry Seymour, while from another hung the flag of Admiral Hamilton. Besides the Inflexible, Britain had sent the Drake, the Argyll and the Duke of Edinburgh. Germany's cruisers, the Victoria Luise, Herthe, Dresden and Bremen, looked spick and span, fit for an errand of peace or a meeting where the guns would not thunder unshotted. They were under Grand Admiral von Koester, who acted as special representative of the German Emperor. Italy's cruisers were the Etna and Etruria. The Etna had on board eighty Italian nobles serving as cadets, ensigns and midshipmen. Three French warships had steamed in early in the week, under the command of Admiral Jules L. M. Le Pard. The Frenchmen made all visitors welcome to their decks, and charmed all by their cordial hospitality. The Dutch warships attracted extra attention, as they represent the country which gave us the Half Moon. But it would be an impossibility to name them all, as they strung out, ship after ship, squadron after squadron, for several miles. Every available merchant steamer from Norfolk to Boston had been hired, and now lined up, every deck crowded with sightseers, to take part in the second division of the parade. Way at the rear were the two ships which caught all eyes—the Half Moon, manned by Hollanders in baggy breeches and doublets, and the Clermont, whose passengers and crew were dressed in the fashions of one hundred years ago.

New York's City Hall Illuminated With 3,600 Electric Lights

The head of the procession lay off Governor's Island, military headquarters of the Department of the East, just below the Battery, at the lower end of the city.

When the signal was given from the flagship for the start the long column, led by the American battleships, began to unwind; the distance between the vessels was increased to regulation length, and the parade started northward up the Hudson River. The enthusiasm of the crowds broke loose at once. Cheers from a million throats rent the air, whistles blew, flags were unfurled and waved wildly and cannon boomed, until the birds in distant Van Cortlandt Park, miles away, startled from their nests by the unusual clamor, rose in flocks, chattering in alarm. Miles inland could be heard the reverberations of the guns, sounding like the bombardment of a city. Estimates of the length of the parade vary, but if the vessels had been arranged in a straight line they would probably have reached at least twenty miles. They moved slowly, two abreast, with not a very wide space between them. On either side patrol boats and revenue cutters dashed hither and thither, to keep the "sea way" open, and compelling the thousands of excursion craft along the shore to keep in line, a most difficult task where "sea room" was at a premium, and the steamers were so close together that they were in constant danger of fouling one another.

The patrol boats had stations about a mile apart and steamed back and forth, meeting at certain fixed points. They not only kept a lookout over the three thousand excursion steamers, but their officers watched the docks carefully, as it was feared that some of them might collapse, overburdened as they were with tons and tons of humanity. In case of such a crash, the patrol boats were to dash to the rescue.

The Palisades and the Parkway, which slopes down to the Hudson River from Riverside Drive, held the population of several cities. Both of these points were excellent as observation stands. Every high building along the North River was fringed around its coping with spectators and every window was black with people.

The official reviewing stand was at One Hundred and Tenth Street, and as the watchers looked down the river and saw the great hulls come into view at Ninety-sixth Street, there was suddenly a sharp detonation and there occurred, in the twinkling of an eye, the most wonderful display of daylight fireworks which has ever been produced in this country. First went up innumerable daylight bombs. Hardly had their gorgeous colors disappeared from the sky when large shells were shot high into the air, each one carrying a parachute to which was attached a large American flag. The shells burst, the parachutes were released and floated slowly away over the river and city, the flags fluttering and snapping in the breeze. Others bombs were shot up among the floating flags, which sent out clouds of smoke of every conceivable color and tint, spreading their opalescent hues for a great distance across the sky.

Again the mortars were crashing and the air was filled with strange forms, as if some wizard of old had called out all of his assisting spirits by the wave of a wand of fire to take part in the celebration. Flying geese of enormous size swept hither and yon, fish swam and dived, as if in their native element; grotesque figures of giant height walked, disdaining the modern aeroplane, across the sky. Amazed, the crowds below did not know whether to watch the parading fleets on the river or the surprises of the fireworks. Usually they compromised by turning their heads one way and then the other, until their necks ached.

There were more volleys, and hundreds of Hudson-Fulton celebration flags broke from the shells, to be followed by a second series, showing in brilliant colors the flags of all the countries which were represented at the celebration.

In the evening there was an illuminated parade of the ships over a shorter course, an illumination of New York and Brooklyn and a fine display of fireworks. The parade of illuminated boats passed up as far as the mouth of Spuyten Duyvil Creek, at the head of the warship line, and then turned back. Every ship in the long line at anchor was strung with varicolored electric lights and lanterns, and the reflection in the dark waters of the Hudson below seemed to double the number. The city itself was turned into fairyland, and to stroll up and down the streets for the one evening would have amply repaid any visitor.

Broadway and adjacent streets are noted as being the best lighted of any in the world. Broadway, in fact, gets its title of "the Great White Way" from the number of lights which burn far into the morning hours. But now the entire city was a blaze of light. The electric lights in all the office buildings were turned on, and the tall structures sparkled with a thousand eyes. Great searchlights were placed on some of them and shot white streams now on the East or North River, now on the fleets, then athwart the sky.

In turn, the warships turned their own searchlights on the city, and upon one another. Illuminated signs and mottoes decorated walls of buildings, the colors being changed, white, red and blue alternating. Fifth Avenue was strung with electric lights, hanging from wires between iron masts, which had been set along the curb from the Washington Arch, at Washington Park, for several miles up to a point along Central Park. The Washington Arch was set with a myriad of lights. The Court of Honor, with its white pillars topped with electric bulbs, was a point of attraction for the visitors on America's most famous avenue, and they would move on with a sigh of regret at leaving such a beautiful scene.

While the illumination was at its height there were loud reports from ten different points along the Hudson, the signal for the evening fireworks. The main display was from floats arranged in a semicircle near the Jersey shore; but from all over the city bursting bombs and rockets filled the air.

Medal Showing the Fulton Bust

The historical pageant of the Hudson-Fulton celebration was one that broke all world records for magnitude, magnificence and artistic qualities. It included fifty-four floats in line, representing the Indian, Dutch, Colonial and Modern periods of this country's history. About 20,000 men formed an escort to these, members of every national and patriotic society in the great city, many of them in uniform or costume. All the principal floats formed brilliant moving tableaux. These, with thousands of American and other national flags, formed one of the grandest spectacles ever seen in this country.

Each float was mounted on trucks especially designed by the commission. In front was a banner, giving its name and number. They were drawn by four horses, covered by blankets, each carrying the celebration letters, "H. F." Men in uniform dress led the horses. Behind each float marched its escort.

Leading the First Division was the Grand Marshal of all the Irish societies; then came the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick and the Ancient Order of Hibernians, Italian, Bohemian, Polish, Hungarian organizations. With their national colors was carried the American flag. Nearly all the national societies participating in the pageant formed central organizations for the occasion. Preceded by heralds came the first float, the title car "History of New York," followed by the title car of the Indian period, with floats representing the legend of "Hiawatha." Then came Five Nations of the First Sachem, escorted by members of the Order of Red Men. The seasons of Blossoms, of Fruits, of Hunting and of Snows, and of the War Dance was escorted by the Tammany Society, Columbian Order. On these floats were real Iroquois Indians taking the parts of the tableaux.

The Second Division represented the Dutch period, and the title car was followed by the Half Moon, "The Fate of Henry Hudson" and "The First Vessel Built on Manhattan Island," manned and escorted by the United Dutch Societies of New York. Then came the "Purchase of Manhattan" and "Bronch's Treaty," the latter manned and escorted by Danes, Bronch having been a Dane. Floats representing the "Reception of Stuyvesant" and "Bowling on Bowling Green" followed. One representing the Huguenots was manned by the Huguenot Societies. "When New Amsterdam Became New York" was in charge of students of New York University.

The first float of the Colonial period was "Schuyler and Indians at the Court of St. James." It was escorted by members of the Society of Colonial Wars, with a mounted body-guard. Scotch societies, in kilts and marching to the music of the bagpipes, escorted the "Trial of Peter Zenger." Then came the "Stamp Act" float, "A Colonial Home," the "Governor Dongan" float, the "Old Manor Hall in Yonkers," the "Exploit of Marinus Willett," "Pulling Down the Statue of George III." and "Publishing the Constitution," manned and escorted by Sons of the American Revolution. "The Storming of Stony Point" was attended by the American Continentals. "The Capture of André" was represented by descendants of John Paulding. The Order of the Cincinnati escorted the float bearing their name. "Washington's Coach" was escorted by the Sons of the American Revolution, and "Washington's Farewell," a scene in Fraunce's Tavern, by Sons of the Revolution.

The Fourth Division represented the United States period. Preceding "Fulton's Ferry" came veterans of the Seventy-ninth Scottish Highlanders. Closing the pageant were the floats "Croton Water," "The Statue of Liberty" and "Father Knickerbocker Receiving."

Thursday was set apart for the great military parade, troops national and State and sailors and soldiers from the visiting warships taking part.

The World's Greatest Celebration

A COURSE in history, in the marvels of electrical illumination, in the progress of aerial flight, and in the marvels of ship-building has been the Hudson-Fulton celebration in New York City, carried through so successfully by the combined resources of the metropolis and the State which bears its name. We have had fairs and expositions extending over several months to commemorate great events, such as the Centennial and the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America, but nothing like the New York celebration has ever before been attempted.

What a lesson in the great events which have made our present place among the world powers possible was the historic parade, where living men again acted the battles, the triumphs of peace and war of our national life! It also taught to the thousands of foreigners, who watched it pass, more of what this country stands for than they could have learned in any other way in many years. They must have felt a greater reverence than ever before for the flag and the men who have given their all to keep it flying above a nation so true to its ideals.

So wonderfully was the progress of the centuries contrasted that it was hard to believe it was not all an elusive dream. Beside the diminutive Half Moon was the giant cruiser Connecticut, and the Clermont steamed at four miles an hour alongside the steamer—its descendant—which goes to Europe in four days.

New York itself was worth the journey across the continent to see. Three hundred years ago a group of Indian wigwams, to-day the most wonderful city in the world, whose great buildings at times cut the low-lying clouds, it epitomized in its own length and breadth the growth of this nation and the progress of the American people, who could plan such a stupendous celebration and carry it to a successful conclusion.

Don't Forget Stricken Monterey

AMID the general jubilation of the Hudson-Fulton celebration we trust that our readers will not forget the appeal of the Monterey sufferers. Late advices from Consul-General Hanna show that the disaster has been far more extensive and the distress more widespread than first reports indicated. Nearly 20,000 people, including many women and children, are absolutely destitute. They need blankets, food and shelter, and they have appealed to our generosity to help them in their time of sore trial and privation. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will forward to the Consul-General all contributions sent to it for that purpose. Our friends, who have so splendidly aided the victims of plague, flood and famine in India, China, Japan, Finland, Cuba, and other lands, have now an opportunity to render special service "in His name" near our own doors. Let it be given quickly and generously.

The Progress of Equal Suffrage

WITH the accession to the suffrage ranks of a large contingent from the rich and fashionable section of society, a new era has opened for the cause. It has heretofore lacked for money and for prestige. Now it has a good deal of both, and, on the whole, its outlook is more promising than ever before. The removal of the national headquarters to 505 Fifth Avenue, New York City, a central and advantageous location, is one result of the new prosperity, and all right-loving hearts must rejoice that this great movement to dignify and uplift womanhood seems on the sure road to success.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, in her delightful speech at Newport, at one of the great meetings lately held there, recalled the early days of the struggle and the privations to which she and her co-laborers were exposed on their lecture trips of fifty and sixty years ago. They were met everywhere with scorn and ridicule, just as the abolitionists were, and those who pleaded for a higher education for women. It does not now seem possible that even since the Civil War, indeed, within the last twenty years, ministers of the Gospel have protested publicly against a college education for women, saying that it would make them less "womanly" and would cause them to "neglect the home."

Now public sentiment is overwhelmingly in favor of a college education for all women who desire it; and all teachers who aim to occupy the best-paid positions must have it. The idea that it masculinizes and hardens has simply died out under the white light of experience, just as the present opposition to equal suffrage will die out.

It is largely because of their earnest realization of the responsibilities of motherhood that so many women desire the ballot; to protect their growing children from the pitfalls set for them by bad men and women in the open streets; to purify and improve our schools; to make the sweat-shops and mills less terrible for our girl workers; in short, to give the preponderating moral and religious influence among us a chance to be felt more effectively.

The fashionable element is proverbially unstable, but there are signs that, in this case, our wealthy women are sharing to a considerable degree the great awakening which has come to so many of their less prosperous sisters, and will persist. The spirit of love and the spirit of freedom are abroad in the land. They lead to new associations and unprecedented alliances; but, as ever, they work for righteousness.

Aeroplane Perils

WILBUR WRIGHT, who has the distinction of being "the first man that flew"—if we wholly eliminate the rather mythical Icarus, whose ambition to fly high was his ruin—has given the general public a timely warning with respect to the growing aeroplane craze. He declares that ninety-nine per cent. of all experiments thus far have been a pure waste of time; that even the best of the machines is still far from being the finished product it ought to be; and he foresees a startling list of fatalities if these machines, in their present crude condition, get into the hands of people who view aeronautics as a new and delightful pastime, and know nothing whatever of its requirements or its perils. There are many people who will take chances in a new venture, believing that pluck and luck will carry them safely through. To this class the aeroplane in its present condition, according to Mr. Wright, will prove a dangerous source of enjoyment.

The Congo Missionary Trial

TWO American missionaries, W. M. Morrison and W. H. Sheppard, are now under trial at Leopoldville, Africa, for alleged libel against the Congo State authorities. Their offense consisted of telling to the world, without qualification, the whole story of misrule, cruelty, oppression, and murder of the defenseless native population. They will be tried before Belgian judges, in a Belgian court, whose jurisdiction has been called in question; but the missionaries will be defended by one of the foremost lawyers in King Leopold's realm, Emile Vandervelde, who as a member of the Belgian Parliament has been fearless in his criticisms of Congo misgovernment. If the whole truth is permitted to come out at this trial, it may assist in bringing about humane reforms in a region where, according to all accounts, these are sadly needed.

The Source of Power

THE soul, the church, the world, are dead iron things; powerless, useless machinery without faith in God. A traveler last summer had an opportunity to realize the uselessness of machinery when cut off from the source of its power. We were on the Atlantic. It was a dark night, thick with fog. The ship was moving steadily and carefully, but strongly. The engines, with regular throb, were sending their energy into every part. All seemed well and safe, when, about midnight, we became aware that the ship's great heart was slowly ceasing to beat; and presently she stopped, and lay still, as if dead. There was nothing wrong with the boilers or the engines—they were full of energy, seemed eager and fretting to be at work again. There was nothing wrong with the propeller. What was the matter? Oh, a very simple thing. Because of the denseness of the fog, the captain thought it best to stop, and the connection was cut off between the propeller and the source of its power, and there we lay for twelve gloomy hours.

Faith is the union between the soul's splendid machinery and the divine energy of God. How helpless, how drifting, how aimless is the finest soul that is cut off from the source of its power!

Why Not Show It?

MANY a young man would give his week's wages to feel his father's arm thrown over his shoulder once in a while, and hear him say, "Well, my boy, how goes it to-day?" Oh, we are too sparing of our cordialities, too much afraid of being thought demonstrative or gushing. For our part, we had rather people would gush a little than let their love or kind feelings just drip, like icicles under compulsion of a winter sun. How much happier we should all be if we thought more about making others happy! "Let your light shine," yes—but also let your heat be felt.

GENERAL NOTES

—THE WOMEN of Cincinnati, to the number of 500, have petitioned the city authorities for representation on the police force. They ask that women police be appointed as officers to guard the public parks against "mashers," until ten o'clock P.M. daily. And now Cincinnatians are asking: Who will guard these ladies, and what would their own home folks do without them?

—LOUISIANA HAS SUFFERED severely from a great tidal wave, which visited the western coast during the hurricane of September 21 and 22. It swept two miles inland, and extended nearly thirty miles along the coast, destroying scores of dwellings in half a dozen fishing villages and causing a loss of life estimated at three hundred in a population of five thousand. The loss to property will reach $10,000,000.

—NOW THAT both Cook and Peary have returned, and the public enthusiasm has spent itself, it is to be hoped that recriminations will cease and that both will prepare the official records of their journey for submission to some scientific body without delay. There should be glory enough in the achievement for both of our brave Polar pathfinders, and the public should be spared further controversy which, in the absence of proofs, is futile and gratuitous.

—THERE IS A BREAK in the ranks of the Christian Scientists. Mrs. Della Gilbert, formerly a reader in that denomination, has announced the formation of a rival organization, to be called "The New Christian Science Church." It is to have its headquarters in New York City. According to Mrs. Gilbert, the revolt is against graft, idolatry, superstition and anti-marriage, and especially against the domination of the present head of the church, Mrs. Eddy. Regular Christian Scientists make light of the schism, and declare it will have a very small following.

—THERE ARE INDICATIONS of an anti-Christian movement in China. The Berlin Missionary Society, in its new Year-Book, just issued, says: "The sentiment of the government is distinctly hostile to Christianity. The Wai-Wu-pu, or Board of Foreign Affairs at Peking, has issued a decree forbidding any Chinese to found an independent church, or to collect any funds for the church. A general desire seems to prevail that the extension of Christianity in China should be checked." Well-informed missionaries see no reason for alarm in the situation. The missionary colleges have made great progress in recent years, and converts have multiplied. It is unquestionable, however, that the attitude of the government is hostile to Christianity and to Western civilization.

President Taft's Trip

PRESIDENT TAFT, on September 15, started from Boston on his 13,000-mile tour of the country, which is to continue until November 10. This is the longest single journey ever taken by a President. Below we give an itinerary, with the day that the President's party is to be in each place.

October 6, San Francisco, Merced and El Portal; 7, 8 and 9, in Yosemite National Park; 10, El Portal, Merced and Fresno; 11 and 12, Los Angeles; 13, Maricopa, Ariz., Phœnix, Prescott and Ashfork; 14, Ashfork and Grand Cañon; 15, Albuquerque, N. M.; 16, Albuquerque and El Paso; 17, San Antonio, Tex.; 18, San Antonio and Corpus Christi; 19, 20 and 21, at Charles P. Taft's ranch; 22, Corpus Christi; 23, Houston and Dallas; 24, Dallas; 25, St. Louis, Mo.; 26 (by boat down the Mississippi), Cape Girardeau, Mo., Cairo, Ill., and Hickman, Ill.; 27, Memphis and Helena, Ark.; 28, Vicksburg, Miss.; 29, Natchez, Miss., and Baton Rouge, La.; 30 and 31, New Orleans, La.; November 1, Jackson, Miss.; 2, Jackson, Durant, West Point, Miss., Columbus, Miss., and Birmingham, Ala.; 3, Birmingham; 4, Macon, Ga., and Savannah; 5, Savannah and Charleston; 6, Charleston, Columbia and Augusta; 7, Augusta; 8, Augusta and Florence, Ga.; 9, Wilmington, N.C.; 10, Richmond and Washington.

The President has been received by the officers and people of the various States, irrespective of political opinions, with the wildest enthusiasm. Some of his addresses have contained words of unusual wisdom. Early in his journey he made an appeal for speedy justice. He denounced the administration of the criminal law in this country as a "disgrace to civilization," and declared that the law's undue delay in civil proceedings always worked for the benefit of the man with the longest purse. He said: "We have had too many lawyers legislating on legal procedure, and they have been prone to think that litigants were made for the purpose of furnishing business to courts and lawyers, and not courts and lawyers for the benefit of the people and litigants." The fault which President Taft condemns is a grievous one, and that so good a lawyer as he and one so influential should promise reform is a matter of congratulation. The ideal ruler of Israel rendered exact justice to all his people.

Assault of Starving Squirrels

A singular occurrence in a grove of New Jersey, not far from New York, is reported Two or three families had assembled in the grove for a picnic; eating time had come, and the food was spread out upon the ground and, just as it was about to be eaten, squirrels, first by tens and then by hundreds, collected in the trees over them. The members of the party turned from their food to count the numbers that had collected. The squirrels began, one after another, to drop to the ground, and a perfect army of savage creatures flew at the people, biting them and seizing and eating the food that had been spread on the grass. A few moments were spent in the fruitless fight, when the families were compelled to hasten to their carriages and drive away. The reason given for the assault was that the nut crop had failed and that the little creatures were wild with starvation. It is said that nothing so stirs the diabolical in human nature as starvation. Most of the vices and crimes of life are the expression of the soul famishing without God. Everything that lives feeds, and the soul, the highest form of created being, feeds on God. With him only is there satisfaction and happiness. Without him there is sin, savagery, crime and death.

For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. (John 6 : 33.)

Metropolitan's Musical Clock

There are unavoidable noises that are harsh and discordant in the great city. There is the unmusical cry of the newsboys, the clatter of horses' hoofs and carriage wheels and surface cars; there are the many unpleasant sounds of the automobile horn and other things; and yet breaking the discord into harmony are the melodious chimes of the great clock in the Metropolitan tower at Madison Square, New York City. The music is made by four bells weighing 13,500 pounds, which hang on the forty-sixth floor of the Metropolitan Life Building. These bells are twice as high as any other large bells in the world, and will announce the time each quarter hour. Hundreds of thousands of visitors to the city during the Hudson-Fulton celebration stopped amidst the noise and worry of the throng to listen to the most delightful melody. There are dark spots in the city, but many bright and beautiful ones. There are jarring discords and there is delicious music. Lovely bells are hung in the towers to regale the spirit and inspire the life. Bells are hung in the houses of God, and in the hearts of his children, that shall refresh and help the busy throng.

And they made bells of pure gold and put the bells between the pomegranates upon the hem of the robe round about between the pomegranates. (Ex. 39 : 25.)

Gift of Royal Palace

When Queen Victoria of Spain visited Santander, about two years ago, she was delighted with the beauty of the district and said that it reminded her of the country about her home in the Isle of Wight. The people of Santander, when they heard of it, through their mayor asked that King Alfonso would allow them to build him a summer home there, and already on the Peninsula de la Magdalena a new royal palace is approaching completion. The $200,000 of our money needed for its construction was provided by the inhabitants of the town, and Spaniards who now reside in America and wished to show their patriotism. The new royal palace is about 110 feet above the level of the sea and has a frontage of 330 feet. It consists of four sections: one for the private use of the King and Queen, another for official receptions and court festivities, and the third and the fourth, which serve as union to the rest, will be used for general service. The Peninsula de la Magdalena, which will soon be transformed into the royal park, is carpeted with a great variety of lilies, pinks and other flowers.

This evidence of the affection and loyalty of these subjects must be very gratifying to the King, especially as there are some other districts in his country that are restless and riotous. The people of Santander, by this generous act, have brought their community into greater prominence, and it is more than likely that the $200,000 expended by them for the new palace will be returned to them in some form or other. But that which was back of the gift, and for which the building will ever stand, is the love of a loyal people, who will ever hope and pray that life, health and prosperity may abound within the King's house.

Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. (Ps. 122 : 7.)

Will Not Die Rich

Daniel K. Pearsons, after having accumulated a fortune, began twenty-five years ago to give his money away to one institution or another. In all, forty-seven colleges in twenty-four States have benefited by his gifts. Among his larger single gifts were $280,000 to the Chicago Theological Seminary; $500,000 to Beloit College; $150,000 to Mount Holyoke, and $300,000 to Whitman College. Up to this time he has parted with about $4,000,000 in benevolences. He has $1,000,000 left, besides enough to keep him comfortably until the end of his life. That million he intends to give to various institutions in the city of Chicago, between now and April 14, when he will be ninety years old and will want to take a little rest before he shall go to his reward. Mr. Andrew Carnegie once said that it is a crime to die rich, and has tried to escape the crime by giving away $150,000,000 of his own fortune. "The Sage of Hindale," as Mr. Pearsons is sometimes called, was so situated in his family relationship that he could give away his entire estate without embarrassment, protest or conflict.

There is no doubt that this man has derived more pleasure in the last twenty-five years in giving away his fortune than he did in all the years he was engaged in accumulating it. It must have been an inspiration to him to realize that thousands upon thousands of young people in the schools and colleges were being educated by his help. It must have been a comfort for him to know how many of the poor and distressed of body, mind and soul had been relieved by his benefactions. This wise and happy-hearted philanthropist is a splendid example to the people of our time, showing them how to gain money honestly and then give it away wisely and cheerfully. In his letter to Timothy, Paul encourages rich men to transform their material gain into spiritual treasure by benefaction.

That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life. (I. Tim. 6 : 18, 19.)

Sermon from Death Chair

Adolpth Bertchey, the "gentleman burglar" of Brooklyn, who murdered Frank Jankowski, a Lakewood hotel porter, just before going to the death chair recently wrote his last message to the world, in the form of a sermon. He said:

I can add but little to what others have said. I would suggest an early religious training. It should begin with the lisping of the child, and be continuous and never end until death. The child should be given to know the dangers of an environment that is not religious. His associates should be those only that reverence God. The parental responsibility comes in here. The child looks for examples. As the example set before it by its parents or associates is good or bad so he will in most cases grow.

If the boy be disciplined in religion with environments good, associations good, and with love as his teacher till he is come to the age of reason, the fruit of the early training will be invariably a moral, religious life. Not all of these came into my early life, but of these that did my one regret is that I did not use them to my advantage.

There is much truth in his statement. His ingratitude for his own home training is largely atoned for by the deep penitence which he expresses at his failure to improve the opportunities which his home afforded him. The important lesson of this sermon, which he made its climax, is the fact, which is as unvarying as the law of gravity, that the most fearful penalty follows the breaking of God's law and the still more important truth that a loving God, through the mediation of Christ, is willing to forgive the breaking of his law and substitute the reward of righteousness for the penalty of sin.

For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. (Rom. 6:23.)

HURRYING RELIEF TO MEXICO

SILENCE, the silence of death, broods to-day over a large part of northeast Mexico, where flood, tidal wave and famine have all been doing their grim work. It is now some time since the flood swept down the mountain-walled valleys of the usually placid Santa Catarina and the other rivers of Nuevo Leon, and it well shows how complete was the destruction of towns, people and roads, that only at the present time are anything like full reports coming in to the relief committees at Monterey and to the government. Telegrams from the acting Secretary of State were published in our last issue, giving official corroboration to the terrible tales of suffering and destitution sent out from the stricken districts.

Dr. Klopsch telegraphed his offer of assistance to President Diaz of Mexico, and received the following reply in Spanish:

MEXICO CITY, MEXICO, Sept. 20, 1909.

Louis Klopsch, Proprietor, "The Christian Herald," New York:

Enterado de su cablegrama del 17. Doy a Vd. muchisimas gracias por su buena disposicion.

PORFIRIO DIAZ.

The translation of the foregoing is as follows:

CITY OF MEXICO, Sept. 20, 1909.

Louis Klopsch, Proprietor, "The Christian Herald," New York:

Received your cablegram of 17th. Many thanks for your kindness. PORFIRIO DIAZ.

Consul-General Hanna is in communication with Dr. Klopsch and keeping this paper informed as to relief operations. The photograph published on this page was sent by the Consul-General. On the back he wrote: "There was not a drop of water in this river until the rain began to fall." The picture shows the stream nearly a mile wide and thirty feet and over in depth.

The telegraph lines have been repaired in many places, but at no time has there been any between the smaller towns, and all communications were brought in by people on foot or on muleback. Refugees came in from a large number of places, reporting an awful loss of life in their districts and the practical destruction of everything in which a human being could find shelter. On account of the ominous silence in some quarters, the government determined to send out exploring parties and detachments of soldiers to discover the living, if there were any in the débris of their homes, and render what aid they could to the sufferers. It was a gruesome march for most of the detachments, which pick their way over rocks and through muddy bottoms. A great part of the distance roads there were none. The soldiers saw more dead in a few brief days than they ever would on many a bloody and desperately contested field in wartime. Often, when reaching the vicinity of some village, they were made aware of its exact location by the flocks of vultures which flopped lazily up into the blue, startled from the ruins by the tread of the approaching exploring party, and let forth discordant cries as they circled above the town, waiting for the living to pass on that they once more might become searchers for the dead. These vultures often were the only living things discovered for many miles in the devastated districts. In the village there would not be a house whose walls were standing; trees, timbers and odds and ends from other towns were piled knee high in the wreck of what a few short weeks ago were the happy homes of some of the most care-free people on the face of the earth. Bodies were everywhere —in the ruins of the adobe huts, in the great masses of débris heaped in the nearest depressions, in the great pools left by the subsiding waters, and along the banks of the rivers, which still chased boisterously along as if wishing again to rise and take up the work of death.

The exploring parties have found enough bodies to bring the number of dead up to thirteen thousand, and there are yet many people unaccounted for. They found over fifteen thousand of the living without any form of shelter, with no more covering than a torn and water-soaked blanket, and picking among the refuse for anything which might be converted into food. Most of them were more or less ill as the result of exposure and lack of food. A large number were still wandering about the mountains, filled with the desire to get away from the river bottoms.

The troops and relief parties gladly shared with them what they had brought, but it was so small that it was but a drop of comfort in this vast sea of misery. Some of the villagers who had lost all that they held dear crouched in the ruins, broken in spirit from grief and emaciated from privation; they were alike indifferent to death or rescue. To the troops they seemed more like corpses than living men and women.

Along the hillsides of the main valleys and well up into the mountains are little camps of refugees, hoping against hope that in some way assistance will be rendered them so they can rebuild their homes, perhaps a little farther back from the former sites, where they can start life anew. It is proposed to make up pack trains of mules, and send what clothing and food can be secured to these hapless people.

The various political factions of Mexico have figuratively buried the hatchet, and are working together to stem the awful tide of misery in the northern district; personal ambitions have appeared trivial in the face of the great disaster which has befallen Nuevo Leon and neighboring States.

Perhaps no better proof of the strength and fury of the storms and floods has been given than the reports of sea captains who have come in from points a hundred miles off the coast. They found the surface of the sea, for a distance of over one hundred miles parallel to the shore line, discolored with earth brought from the interior by the streams emptying into the Gulf of Mexico. There were driftwood, pieces of houses and furniture, and whole trees had been torn up by the roots. The captain of one of the Ward Liners reports that, when near the coast, he could see through the telescope that the rivers had overflowed their banks for a long distance on either side. From the canyons of the mountains great floods of water were pouring into the lower levels.

The coast was inundated shortly after the floods had occurred inland at Monterey by a gigantic tidal wave, which rose out of the sea on a perfectly calm day and swept westward, sweeping away everything in its path. As it happened in the daytime, most of the people, fortunately, were able to escape from their homes and reach higher land; one village, however, was completely overwhelmed, and is now covered by the sea. Is it small wonder that, flooded first from one direction and then from another, the people have been for several weeks in a state of panic?

It is an opportunity for the finest Christian service in Mexico to relieve the sufferings of these stricken people, and the American people everywhere are awakening to that fact. Every contribution sent is doing practical missionary work, showing the flood sufferers that we back our words with deeds. The case of the women and little children is most pitiful, and they must be helped unless there will be loss of life from exposure and starvation, that will make the people of the United States stand aghast and conscience stricken. Already large numbers have given up the struggle and have followed those who were carried to death in the flood.

Consul-General Hanna reports that hungry, half-clothed refugees are still coming by the hundreds to the Consulate for the help which has been so freely given and which has made firm friends for the Americans among the stricken people of northern Mexico.

A small contribution to the fund will be the means of saving some mother to care for her little ones, or snatch back some child from the edge of the grave, to be a comfort and help to its parents for years to come.

No one who can help should delay in the face of such a crying need as this. Send your contributions to the Mexican Relief Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

MIDNIGHT CALLERS

A STORY IN TWO PARTS. BY ISABELLA MACDONALD ALDEN ("Pansy")

PART I.

MISS RACHEL HOLLAND capped her fountain pen, set it with a determined thud in its standard on the office table, and pushed back her chair with a weary sigh that had in it an element of relief. It had been a busy, wearing day.

All her days were busy, but the wearing quality of this one seemed to stand out more prominently than usual.

That haunting spectre of the unduly weary, whose name is "What-is-the-use?" was goading her. "After all," it was saying to this tired girl, "what have you accomplished? You have seen and talked with threescore people who are mental, or physical, or moral failures—in an alarming number of instances they were all three. You have sympathized with some, given your caustic opinion of them to others, and had your stenographer take down a volume of statistics for future reference. Because of your day's experience you are conscious that the day has made a distinct contribution to the sum of human misery. You have met and considered a number of new cases of that disease which, however hidden by various names, has, after all, one short, sharp, ugly word to cover its history, and that word is—sin. But of what good is it that you should be conscious of this? Is the world one whit better, permanently better for your day of toil? You have alleviated some suffering, but only alleviated, not removed its cause; and to-morrow, or the next to-morrow, they will be just as bad, and the next day after the to-morrows they will be worse; and so the weary round will go on. Of what use is it all?"

She was very tired. She must get home and rest and sleep. She could not think another thought to-night. Wasn't it almost twelve? Yes, the clock was striking, and doubtless her carriage was waiting for her; she would not keep it waiting much longer. Some of the faithful night workers were already moving about in the next rooms; she would not need to wait for the night secretary. Ah, there he was, probably. The outer door opened and closed and her office door was pushed open; but not by the night secretary. This was a tall man, with disheveled hair and bleared eyes, and the too well-known signs of dissipation written all over him. His clothing was muddy and torn and in general disorder, yet there were indications that it had once been correct in style and of good material. He spoke with the peculiar drawling whine of the semi-intoxicated man, who has decided to make an irresistible appeal.

"Oh, madam, for the love of heaven let me have a quarter, just a single quarter, to relieve this awful hunger, which is driving me wild! I haven't tasted food, madam, since night before last; and neither have my wife and three children. We are starving, but a single quarter will save us; give it to me quick, for the love of heaven!"

Miss Holland looked upon him coldly, and spoke with utmost calmness. She had seen too many of his kind to be moved either by fear or compassion. "For the love of whisky, you mean. You have had too many quarters already. Why didn't you say you were thirsty?"

"God knows I am that, madam; but not for liquor. I haven't touched a drop in four months."

Miss Holland made an impatient movement; she had borne a great deal that day.

"What do you fancy you will gain by such barefaced lying?" she asked. "Are you too far gone to have a shred of common sense? You are drunk this minute!"

The man's mood changed. His face broke into a half-drunken smile, and he spoke in a confidential tone.

"Say, how did you find that out?" Long experience had hardened Rachel Holland's nerves to some scenes; the comic side of this one struck her, and she laughed. "It is marvelous that I should have done so," she said; "but it is true, nevertheless, and you will get no quarter here. Still, I have no doubt but that you are very thirsty. How would a cup of coffee, strong and hot, affect you, do you think?"

As she spoke she touched the electric button at her side, and a young man, one of the early night force from the mission, made instant response.

"A cup of coffee, David," said Miss Holland. "Be sure that it is strong."

In an incredibly brief time the steaming cup was in the man's shaking hand. He seized it as a drowning man catches at whatever comes, and gulped it down without stopping for breath. Miss Holland was watching him closely.

"Another, David," she found herself murmuring, as the hot liquid disappeared. The man had dropped into a chair, but his whole frame seemed to reel for a moment under the effect of the strong, hot potion.

He grasped at the second cup with the same feverish abandon he had shown before, but under the power of the third one his confused brain righted itself and he looked up at Miss Holland with sane though hopeless eyes.

"Thank you," he said, in the tone of a gentleman. "I must have needed it. I have no idea what I said when I came in here, but if it was something wrong I want to beg your pardon. I will not intrude upon you longer."

He arose with a pitiful effort at dignity and began to move toward the door. Miss Holland was studying his face.

"Wait," she said, imperatively. "Where are you going?"

"God only knows!" he said. Then, after a second, his face hardened and he added quickly:

"To ruin, as fast as possible. There is nothing else for me."

"That is almost as foolish and quite as false as what you told me when you came in. There is everything left for you to win, if you choose. A lost manhood, a good name, a home—I don't think you have any wife or children, but perhaps you have a mother?"

"'You might as well talk to a dead man about reforming,' said he"

She knew by the instant flash in his eyes that she had touched a true chord, and went on, rapidly:

"And there is no reason in the world why you should make her wish that she had never borne you, instead of thanking God for you every day of her life, as she will, if you give her a chance."

The man straightened himself to his full height—and he was tall—and took a step toward her. He was under strong excitement, but he kept his voice well modulated.

"Madam, you don't know to whom you are speaking. You might just as well talk to a dead man about reforming. There would be as much hope of him as there is of me. I am a hopeless ruin, and nothing else. You think I haven't tried it? I have done everything, exhausted every possible method, and failed."

"No, you haven't," she said calmly. "There is no use in talking in that way to me, because I know better. You haven't exhausted God, and you don't know him, although you have twice professed to appeal to him since you came in. You have never honestly tried him or you would have won."

Nothing more quietly assuring than Miss Holland's voice could be imagined. There was no excitement, apparently there was not even feeling; it was as if she was stating merely a bed-rock fact.

"God!" he said, like one amazed, almost overwhelmed.

"Yes—it is a great word; and it represents a great, an irresistible force, always ready to be exercised on the side of the man who will have it. That is why I know you haven't tried it—it never fails."

He stood and stared at her. She spoke on, still with utmost quiet. "You are too dazed to-night to take hold of the thought. You need—are you hungry? I thought not"—as with a gesture of almost loathing he waved aside the thought of food—"you need a hot bath, a decent bed and a night's sleep. By morning you ought to be able to act like a reasoning being, instead of like a mere animal. I will put you in the way of getting what you need now, provided you will follow my directions."

He was staring at her, not with a vacant, but with an amazed stare.

"Madam," he said, "who are you?"

"I am a servant of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is the God of whom I told you. He has directed me to look after you to-night. Will you follow his lead?"

"I don't know," he said, his eyes dropping and a look of despair flowing over his face, "I cannot trust myself. My promises are worthless. I have tried them."

"I am going to trust you." Her hand was on the bell as she spoke, and she turned as the door promptly opened.

"David, is John Edson here to-night?"

"Just came in, Miss Holland."

"Ask him to step here, please."

Almost immediately another tall, clean-faced, well built young man entered, and the two exchanged a few low-toned words, then both of them turned to the stranger, who still stood with dropped eyes and despairing face.

"If you will go with this young man," Miss Holland said, in a matter-of-course, business tone, "he will see that you have what you most need to-night and to-morrow morning. After that, you shall decide what next."

The man turned great hungry eyes on her face, and shook his head. "It's of no use," he said. "I oughtn't to impose on you. I am not to be trusted as far as the door."

"I am," said Miss Holland; "and so is God, and John Edson is his servant. Trust him, and go right along; it is very late."

Left to herself, Rachel Holland bowed her head on the desk before her and was still. She was very tired, but the Spectre named "What-is-the-use" had moved on. He had been exorcised under the power of that potent name, "The Lord Jesus Christ." She was his servant, and there was use. He and they working together would win. Presently she raised her head and, drawing a writing-pad toward her, reached for the pen she had put away

OCTOBER DAYS

Neighbors

"BETTER is a neighbor that is near than a brother that is far off," is a proverb of the wisest of men. Many of the proverbs of Solomon fit into the experiences of our life to-day in the twentieth century after Christ, just as they fitted into the life of antiquity. There are crises in the family when a practical neighbor within reach is worth more than the most devoted relative twenty miles away. "The baby burned her hand on the range one morning when my back was turned," said a young mother, "and for an instant I was frantic. I had no remedies and no knowledge of what to do, and there was my darling in agony. Fortunately, my next door neighbor had brought up a half dozen children, and was the kindest and most resourceful of women. I sent for her, and she was on the spot without an instant's delay, knowing exactly how to treat a burn and how to soothe a suffering child. What should I have done if I had been on a ranch, without a neighbor within call?"

In that fascinating little story, Anne of Green Gables, a child is attacked by croup in the absence of its parents. The country doctor is not within reach, being away on a long round of calls, and the little one must have perished before help could arrive but for the promptness, courage and efficiency of a young girl in the neighborhood, who had seen children in the suffocation of croup, knew exactly what must be done, and did it without delay.

Those who live remote from neighbors not only understand how acute the pangs of loneliness can be, but are deprived of the sympathy and aid that a good neighbor can give in an emergency. Still, when letters come to this page from women who look forward to the arrival of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as to a letter from an intimate friend, or a visit from a welcome acquaintance, women whose neighbors are two, three, five or ten miles distant across prairie or mountain range, the thought comes that they might be as desolate were they residents of a great city. The indifference of the city and its utter lack of neighborliness is harder to endure and more pronounced than the loneliness of a countryside, where acres are wide and homes far apart. In one of the enormous apartment houses of New York a merry party of friends met one evening. They were congenial, and they had converged from different quarters of the town, invited for similarity of taste and for reasons of intimacy. Jests, laughter, the sparkle of bright conversation and several numbers of charming music, with voice and piano, made the hours fly as if enchanted. At the close of the evening, the company, taking leave of their host, stepped into the elevator to descend to the street. As they waited for it a group of people in deep mourning, with faces pale and tear-stained, reached the landing, crossed the hall and disappeared into an opposite apartment. "The mother must be dead," said the lady of the house. "I knew that she was ill, but I had not heard of her death. They have just returned from the funeral, I am sure." Here was a marked contrast. No doubt it was an extreme instance of the distance that may separate people who live within the same walls, when the walls are those of a many-storied building in a big town.

A gentlewoman from the South, having been all her life accustomed to the cordial amenities and gracious courtesy of the inland city where she had been brought up, ventured one morning to send a plate of delicious rolls, delicately browned in the crust and white as foam beneath it, to an unknown woman who lived across the hall from her. She placed the rolls on one of her finest plates, covered them with a snowy napkin, and, with her compliments, despatched her little maid to present them to her neighbor. The offering was not received in the spirit that prompted it. On the contrary, the gift was returned, with a curt and most uncivil message. No spirit or thought of good neighborhood was here displayed by a woman who resented the act of a person to whom she had not been introduced as an unwished-for intrusion. This little story is passed on to the lonely dweller on the ranch for her consolation.

At the extreme points of the compass there seems to be a possibility of meeting in this matter of having neighbors or having none. Loving one's neighbor is enjoined upon us in Holy Writ. Who is our neighbor? Who but the one who needs us most? If we have the idea of the neighbor that Jesus would have his followers show, and by which he would have them live, we shall count as our neighbor not merely the friend in the pleasant home, but the tramp on the highroad and the waif in the alley. We shall look upon none with patronage. We shall treat no one with condescension. If we can give or receive neighborly kindness, we shall do it in the spirit of the Master. Then only may we hope to receive the benediction of his "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these little ones, ye did it unto me."

A WILDWOOD PET

Little lizard, child of nature,
Fond of sunshine all the day,
Do you like those gentle comrades,
Who have tamed you for their play?

—NAMING THE BABY. I would not give the baby an awkward name like Adonijah or Jabez, even if it had been handed down through six generations. If I felt obliged to yield to the persuasions of the family, I would slip it in as a middle name, and give the dear child somethi: ~ that he will enjoy for his first name.

Let the Boys Help You

"MY boys make the bread," wrote the mother of eight children to the editor of this page. The home is on the Pacific slope, and the mother, who must have a special genius for management, has so thoroughly organized her household and so well taught her boys and girls that every one of them is her able assistant in domestic affairs. "We use a great many loaves of bread in the course of a week, and the boys are strong and understand that perfect bread requires very thorough kneading. They have mastered every step of the process, and I wish you could see how immaculate they are as to hands and dress, always wearing white linen jackets and aprons when handling the bread. Nothing else is required of the two lads who relieve me of this work. Each of the other children has his or her task to do, but I have made a very special endeavor to teach my sons how to perform what is usually considered woman's work. It is often hard work and bows the shoulders of the wife and mother. If ever my boys are married, they will not allow their wives to do all the drudgery or carry the heavier end of domestic toil."

The letter contains a suggestion for mothers. Why not expect your boys to help you indoors, just as you would if they were girls? Soldiers and sailors undertake a great deal of work that other boys scorn, and they do it with a neatness and efficiency that exceeds the work of most women. The best professional cooks are men, and so are the best tailors. Let the boys bear a hand in helping you, and in return keep yourself, dear mother, buoyant and young and cheerful for your boys.

The Woman of Fifty

The girl of sixteen regards the woman of fifty as more than middle-aged, and in her youthful eyes the woman still older is far on the downhill road that leads to the journey's end. In reality, the woman of fifty at present is what the woman of thirty-five was in the days of our grandmothers. Jane Austen and her contemporaries chose their heroines by preference among girls under twenty. Women approaching forty were spoken of as having passed their prime, and probably regarded themselves as elderly.

The woman of fifty in our time is approaching the serenity of life's sweetest upland, and is entering upon the beauty of life's Indian summer. Many of her earlier tasks are now fulfilled. She has leisure to take up old studies and burnish neglected accomplishments. She writes papers for her club, and, understanding parliamentary order, enters into debates and discussions with enthusiasm and ability. She travels at her discretion, sees new lands and accumulates new stores. She is in the glow and peace of most attractive matronhood, and socially reigns a queen. At fifty the American woman has poise, grace and dignity, and is everywhere welcome for her own sake. She ought to be a little careful as to the style of her bonnets and the fit of her gowns, and she should not permit younger people to put her on the shelf. She still belongs to the activities of life and has her own part to play on life's stage.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—PHYLLIS G. I am not an advocate of the new spelling. The only advantage in it that I can see is that it affords a shield to bad spellers. If the time ever comes when we all spell as we please, according to our different powers of hearing, the printed page will be as confused as a dissected map. Words in the English language are of many derivations. They are traceable to the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, German, French, Icelandic or other stock, and those who love to study language can see at a glance whence they come. We should lose much that is scholarly by phonetic spelling.

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

Mrs. E. DeM. C., Attica, Ind. When was the word "club" first applied to organizations?

Although clubs are very old, the word "cluh" is comparatively modern. It was first used in its popular sense in the time of the Tatler and the Spectator, in Addison's days. It is derived from the Saxon word cleofan, to divide, referring to a limited enterprise, the expenses of which are divided in equal shares. Aubrey wrote (in 1659) "we now use the word 'clubbe.'" One of the earliest clubs was organized in the time of Henry IV. In Shakespeare's day they were plentiful.

E. G. B., Urhana, Ill. Has the State of New York a battleship in the United States Navy?

The States do not have any ships in the United States Navy. The navy belongs to the whole country. There is an armored cruiser bearing the name New York. The general rule is for battleships and some large cruisers to bear the names of States, other cruisers to bear the names of cities. Smaller craft may bear the name of some naval hero. There seem, however, to have been exceptions made to the original plan for naming the ships.

Mrs. M. A. S., Glover, Vt. Please explain I. Sam. 16:14, and reconcile it with James 1:13.

The Hebrews were accustomed to ascribe every malignant disorder to the Lord, and the words of this verse are merely a figure of speech of this character. Josephus, the Jewish historian, says, relative to this passage: "Some strange disorders came upon him and brought upon him such suffocations as were ready to choke him." In other words, he was a gloomy, disappointed man; a hypochondriac, jealous, irritable, vindictive, and almost insane over the threatened extinction of his royal house. There is little doubt that the seizure mentioned in the verse was a species of violent religious frenzy, or momentary madness. The passage in James 1 does not in any sense contradict the other.

C. E. B., Bowling Green, O. The world has made considerable progress since the days of the Spanish Inquisition, and the burning of Bibles and the killing of non-Catholics by Catholics. Such things only happen nowadays in a few remote places. We have illustrations of persecution and Bible-burning occasionally in South America, but such things could hardly happen in Europe now, and certainly not in our own country. Besides, we should not forget that there was a time when Protestants were guilty of many excesses in the name of religion. Catholics are Christians: they believe in Christ, and although they differ from us in many things, they have the essentials of Christianity. We should not feel bitterness nor hatred toward them. At the same time, we believe that their attitude in keeping back the Bible from their people is a great mistake.

W. S. H., Washington, D. C. How can a person be called a Christian who does not acknowledge the divinity of Christ?

No one who denies the divinity of Christ has a right to claim the name of Christian. Christ himself said: "He that denieth me in the presence of men, shall he denied in the presence of the angels of God." There are some persons who, professing to accept the philosophy and teachings of Jesus, yet rejecting his divinity, claim to be Christians; but Christ himself has set the seal of official repudiation on such a claim. Mohammedans believe that Issa (Jesus) was a great teacher, but the Mohammedan does not therefore claim to be a Christian.

J. W. W., Pleasantville, N. J. Please explain II. Cor. 7:1.

Paul was exhorting the Corinthians to pure and holy living and urging them to do battle with the temptations of the flesh. This cleansing would be a positive step towards holiness and an acceptable attitude in God's sight. The condition of the church in Corinth at this time was such as to justify his rebuke.

Miss Alina F., Knightdale, N. C. Can I keep the Sabbath day holy and not go to church or a place of worship on that day, even if there is nothing to prevent me from going?

The Scriptures abound with injunctions to Sabbath observance, and under both dispensations it is made clear that we are to worship God in his temple on that day. See Isa. 58:13; 66:23; Ezek. 46:1; Mark 6:2; Luke 4:16; 6:6; 13:10; Heb. 10:25; and many other passages. Assembling for worship in God's house is a privilege which Christians should hold very highly, and when it is neglected, a means of grace is thrown away. God instituted the Sabbath, commanded it to be kept, and there is a blessing to those who honor it. How otherwise, then, can we keep it holy in the fullest sense, when it is specially ordained as a day of worship?

M. S., W. Philadelphia, Pa. Will you kindly explain the meaning of "the magnetic pole," and at what point do the explorers fix it?

The magnetic pole does not coincide with the geographic pole which has been recently discovered. The magnetic pole is the point at which the lines of magnetic force become vertical. It is at about latitude 70½ degrees north, longitude 97 degrees west. It is slowly but constantly moving, probably in an orbit. Amundsen passed over it about two years ago. We say generally that the compass points to the north pole, as the few hundred miles between the two poles at this distance are scarcely perceptible.

C. B. M., Lake City, Fla. Please explain Rev. 18:5.

This entire chapter and preceding one have long been subjects of dispute among Biblical scholars. Some have held that Babylon indicated the Roman Church, and others, with equal reason, have asserted that it referred to that portion of the Church of Christ which had apostatized, holding that Christendom, divided into many sects, is itself Babylon, i.e., confusion. Corrupt and lifeless Christianity, given over to the pleasures of the world and the flesh, and having lost the pure faith, becomes the bitter antagonist of the true church, subjecting it to slander and persecution.

G. H., Arbovale, W. Va. Please explain Ps. 37:5. What is meant by "way"?

The Hebrew reading is "Roll thy way upon Jehovah," the image being that of one rolling up off from his own shoulders a burden which he is unable to bear, upon the shoulders of another who is able. The "way," however, must be interpreted to mean thy "doings" and "undertakings": "Roll thy works upon the Lord" and he shall bring to pass what you desire to do, but cannot in your own strength.

W. D., Silverton, Colo. Do you consider rich men successful as Christians should understand success? Would we do right, as Christians, to inculcate in our children a desire for success as viewed from worldly standpoints or by methods in which the manipulators of Wall Street are considered the most successful?

From a Christian standpoint, the mere amassing of wealth is not success. Still less is it so to be regarded when that wealth is secured through doubtful means, by oppression, extortion, vicious speculation, etc. But prosperity may and often does come to men legitimately, as the result of business ability and foresight. Many of our foremost Americans have acquired honorable fortunes by opening up new avenues of trade, and devising new industries which have given employment to thousands. While no right-thinking man can approve the methods of Wall Street, it is not the part of a Christian to select individuals for characterization and condemnation. Judgment belongs to God alone; we have neither the necessary knowledge nor the right to judge others.

D. H. B., Hanover, Pa. What was the king's name, the husband of Drusilla, whom Felix persuaded to become his wife?

Drusilla was the wife of Azizus, king of Edessa, but she deserted him and became the consort of Felix.

C. J. M., Sallis, Miss. What is the meaning of "Gentile" under the new and old dispensations, and who are the "Gentiles" to-day?

Under the Old Testament dispensation the term "Gentile" was at first employed to indicate in a general sense other nations than the Jews themselves, but it gradually acquired a meaning distinctly hostile. In New Testament times its meaning generally implied opposition to Israel, although sometimes it is used to indicate Greeks. The Jews did not regard the Gentiles as brethren, would not even save them when in peril, and taught that they would all be destroyed when the Messiah came. The word has hardly any significance now among intelligent Hebrews.

E. O. W., Wisdom, Mont. How tall was Goliath? How much did his spear and armor weigh?

His height was "six cubits and a span," equal to 10½ feet. We have no means of telling accurately the weight of his armor.

R. McA., Lockport, N. Y. Who wrote the lines "Silence is the perfectest herald of joy"?

They are in Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing," Act II., Scene 1.

Here is a beautiful letter from an aged lady reader:

"DEAR EDITOR: My attention has been attracted by seeing articles written inquiring into the future life, if we shall know our loved ones after death. The greatest comfort I have in this life is the assurance of meeting my loved ones in the home beyond. The Scriptures confirm it. Can we not with David rejoicingly declare: 'They cannot come to us, but we can go to them'? The belief in heavenly recognition presents a strong and touching motive to piety. God designs that the death of our friends and our desire to meet them again, should lead us to piety. I look to recognize again, through the beautiful mask of their perfection, the dear familiar faces I have somewhile loved on earth."

Rev. Alfred Noon, Boston, writes: "You recently inserted an answer to a query about the painting of "The Last Supper,' in Milan, and stated what was correct, until within a few months, but happily is now changed. The painting has very recently been restored, and now is on display in the church, in all its original beauty, less than ten minutes' walk from the great cathedral. Perhaps there cannot be found a more beautiful blue than the sky in the representation of the window scene in the painting. It was my privilege to see the great work early in May of this year."

E. B., Missoula, Mont. What is the meaning of Mark 2:19-20?

Christ was explaining to his questioners, who had asked why his disciples did not fast as did those of John, that the latter fasted as waiting for the bridegroom. Now, he being present with them in person, there was no need to fast. Then, in the prophetic spirit, he foreshadowed his own departure (see verse 20), when they would have a reason for fasting. It was one of his familiar and apt illustrations, in the form of a parable.

J. A. S., Chickamauga, Ga. Do the Bible and science agree as to the age of the earth?

The Bible does not say how old the earth is. It simply says (Gen. 1:1): "In the beginning [which might mean countless ages] God created the heaven and the earth." The chronological notations, which you will find in the margins of many Bibles, are not a part of the Book itself, but are calculations made by Archbishop Ussher, a distinguished prelate in the sixteenth century. They are of no practical value in computing the earth's age, but are serviceable in fixing the periods after recorded history begins. For your second question, we would refer you to The Scientific American, New York.

Earnest Seeker, Manchester, N. Y. What does Hebrews 6: 4-6 mean?

This passage deals with apostates who have fallen away from faith and who, having once had a knowledge of the truth (or having been "illuminated"), have deliberately gone into sin and unbelief. It does not refer to a mere falling away, but to total apostasy. Those who have fallen may yet be renewed; but in the case described in the chapter under discussion, "the impossibility of renewal rests in their having known in themselves once the power of Christ's sacrifice, yet, now rejecting it deliberately, there cannot possibly be any new means of argument for their renewal afresh, "their consciences being seared, or as Jude expresses it (Jude 12) being "twice dead."

J. D., Providence, R. I.; M. H., Zeeland, Mich.; E. E., Oakland, Calif., etc. It is by no means certain which of the Pharaohs was Egypt's king at the time of the Exodus. Wilkinson says he was Thothmes II., Prudhoe says Pthahmen, others say Sethos II., and Manetho says Meneptah (or Amenophis), the son of Rameses II. Neither the Bible nor Josephus gives any clue to his identity, and the finding of the mummy of Meneptah in the tomb of Amenhotep II. proves nothing either one way or the other. Besides, the Biblical narrative does not state distinctly that Pharaoh himself was drowned in the Red Sea.

PAUL'S CHRISTIAN HEROISM*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IT will help our understanding of Paul's trial before Felix if we have ever been in a court-room, and now recall what we saw done and what we heard said there. We saw the judge, presiding over the court; we saw the prisoner before the bar; the advocates, or lawyers; the witnesses, the jury, the interested spectators. In Paul's case, the court-room was in Herod's palace, in Cæsarea; the judge was Claudius Felix, governor of Judea, in which province Cæsarea was located. The advocates were Tertullus, who was hired by the Jews; and Paul, who appeared in his own defense. The Jews were the witnesses affirming the charges made by Tertullus. Jury there was none. The governor committed Paul to prison, to await a further hearing. We are not told who, or how many, were the spectators, but undoubtedly many were there.

Tertullus made three charges against Paul:

1. Treason Against Rome. "This man is a pestilent fellow, and a mover of insurrections among all the Jews throughout the world"—against Rome, because the Jews were under Roman rule.

2. Heresy. The Romans had nothing to do with the Jewish religion; it did not concern them.

3. Sacrilege. In profaning the temple. The honor of the temple was nothing to the Romans. Their sole care was to prevent mob violence there in the name of good government.

Tertullus had prefaced these charges by a most fulsome salutation to Felix: "By thee we enjoy much peace, and by thy providence evils are corrected; we accept it in all ways, and in all places, most excellent Felix, with all thankfulness." It was well known that Felix was one of the basest men ever sent by the Romans as a ruler to Judea. He was corrupt both in public affairs and in private, a taker of bribes.

When Tertullus had made his three charges, Felix beckoned to Paul that it was his time to speak. "I cheerfully make my defense, because thou hast been a judge of this nation many years," began Paul. Paul was saying, in polite language, "you have had abundant opportunity to know these people, and are therefore in a position to do justice."

Paul flatly denied all three charges. And then Paul explained in detail how these charges could not be true, and challenged them to prove the things whereof they accused him. And then Felix postponed the case, urging that he wished to hear the testimony of the chief captain, Lysias. But that he had already in the letter which Lysias had written him that "he had found nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds." The real reason for the postponement, we are told further on, was that he hoped money would be given of Paul as a bribe for freedom. But he did not know his man. For two years Paul was his prisoner, and during that time he toyed with Paul as a cat does with her prey. He sent for Paul to come into his august presence, and that of his noble wife, that he might have an exhibition of Paul's learning and oratory. Paul made the best possible use of the opportunity to preach the Gospel of Christ, as he reasoned of righteousness and self-control and the judgment to come. It was a time of reckoning for Felix and Drusilla. Felix was terrified, perhaps Drusilla also. But Felix could bear no more and dismissed Paul to his prison, with the polite saying: "Go thy way for this time, and when I have a convenient season I will call thee unto me." At the end of two years Felix was removed from Cæsarea, and left Paul in chains.

As to Felix, Dr. Parker says: "I think it can be shown that Felix is still alive. It is a wonderful characteristic of the Bible that all its characters are still with us. Adam is still living, and Eve is yet at his side; Cain, the murderer, is still abroad, still shedding blood, still inspiring society with fear. The men of the Bible were not mere individuals; they were types, they were symbols. Felix was sated with flattery. Wherever he came, men stood up, nor dare they sit down until they received his haughty permission. . . . Felix was interested in religious discussion. That Felix is still alive—the worldly, grasping, avaricious man who likes to spice his life with religious metaphysics and religious controversies. . . . Felix lived in sin, he did not dabble in it, he was no retail criminal; he lived, he wallowed in sin. Is it possible that a man can live in sin, and yet send for an apostle to speak concerning the faith in Christ? It is not only possible, it is quite a common practice. "Felix trembled." Then there is hope for him. Are there not such men among us in hundreds and thousands? There is a possibility of becoming too familiar with that kind of emotion. . . . Felix was open to bribery amidst all this conflict of emotion. . . . We do not always take the bribe in the form of money; we have lived long enough and sufficiently under Christian education to know that the gift of money is the vulgarest form of bribe; but there is a wonderful mystery of giving and taking still."

As to Paul. In the words chosen for our Golden Text Paul said: "I have a conscience void of offense toward God and men always." Paul did not thereby claim himself to be a perfect man, but a sincere man. He had been a sincere persecutor of Christians, but how different was his viewpoint then! His changed views enabled him to be a sincere preacher of the Lord Jesus. He was a sincere member of the Nazarenes. He was sincere when he advised against the Greeks submitting to all Jewish practices. He was sincere when he helped the Nazarites in fulfilling a vow made according to the Jewish ritual. How could Paul be so many-sided a man and yet be always true? We answer, his conscience was not always the same. In the first stage he was an Old Testament Jew, in the second stage he was a New Testament Christian, but always conscientious according to the light he had. We quote from Tarbell's Notes: "The Duty of Educating the Conscience. Some one has said that conscience is like a sun-dial: when the sun shines on it, it points the right way; but it may be covered up so that no truth can fall on it, or false lights may fall on it, and then it leads one astray. The owner of the sun-dial must see that it receives the true light, and so must the owner of the conscience. Paul's conscience was void of offense toward God when, as Saul the Pharisee, he persecuted the Christians: "I verily thought with myself," he said, "that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth." When he found that false light had been falling on his conscience he did not say that he would not trust it again, but he took the utmost pains to let the true light shine on it, and then he trusted its guidance implicitly. "Men get embarrassed by the common cases of misguided conscience," said Dr. Thomas Arnold, "but a compass may be out of order as well as a

We buy our material in tremendous lots when the market is low. Our foundry is working all the year around. And so we bring costs down to the lowest possible figure. Then we add one small selling profit to these already low costs and that makes the price you see in our catalog. Your local dealer in selling stoves would have to charge you at least $10.00 to $20.00 more.

Write for Our FREE Stove Book

We ask you purely in your own interests to send for this book at once. It tells you about the quality that goes into every stove. It tells how each stove is put together and inspected to insure absolute perfection. And it also tells how we keep some of our high grade stoves in warehouses located throughout the country at all principal shipping points and thus insure conscience, and the needle may point south, if you hold a powerful magnet in that direction. Still, the compass, generally speaking, is the true and sure guide, and so is the conscience; and you can trace the deranging influence in the latter quite as surely as in the former."

Christian Virtue Exemplified by Paul Before Felix

The Grace of Courtesy. Paul was most courteous to Felix: "I cheerfully make my defense." The gentle but firm voice, the quiet and dignified manner, must have accompanied such words. A Christian cannot afford to be irritable, nervous, or rude even to those who are opposing him. A noted gambler had a grievance. He had been treated unjustly in an international matter. He had been prevented from carrying out his schemes, while others of his class were permitted to go on with identical schemes. A strange chain of circumstances brought him with his story to a Christian woman. He was frank enough in the beginning to tell her just what sort of a man he was. After listening to his story, the lady said: "You are justified in the ground you take against favoritism, but you are wholly unjustified in your sort of business." Surprised by the reasonable and frank manner of the lady, he replied: "I have made up my mind to give up horse-racing and gambling, but I am also determined to check the unfair advantage these other men have gained." Words of encouragement were spoken by the lady to strengthen him in his purpose of quitting, and a few polite words ended the interview, with a promise from the man that the lady should hear from him again. "Execute true judgment, and show kindness and compassion, every man to his brother" (Zech. 7:9). "Love as brethren: be pitiful; be courteous" (I. Pet. 3:8).

It is a mark of noble character to show courtesy to those who are inferior to ourselves.

Ian Maclaren gives a good caution in the following words: "If any one differs from us in politics and religion, or in the affairs of business or our family, we are bound to believe that he loves truth as passionately, and desires to fulfil righteousness as fully as we do, and that if in this matter he has not seen so clearly, yet he is as religious, as intelligent, as high principled, and as kind-hearted as we consider ourselves to be, or as in our high moments we really are. It is unpardonable to impute to an opponent mercenary motives of action, disloyalty to a common cause, indifference to the highest ends, and personal unworthiness of character. This is bad manners, and proves an inherent pettiness of soul, the moral narrowness of a man who cannot imagine goodness disassociated from his opinions or carried out by other than his methods."

The Grace of Frankness

Evidently Paul did not know how to hedge; if he did, it was not in his line of action. He stoutly denied the accusations brought against him—all but one: that he belonged to the sect of the Nazarenes. To this charge he said to Felix: "I confess unto thee that, after the way which they call a sect, so serve I the God of our fathers." "Nazarenes" was a term of contempt applied by the enemies of Jesus to his followers. He was not only frank in making this statement, but he was loyal and truthful. Neither was he ashamed of Jesus. At the same time he declared himself a believer in the law and the prophets. He was consistent in that, for Jesus himself had said that he came not to destroy, but to fulfil the law and the prophets (Matt. 5:17). Paul had the courage of his convictions. Contrast with him Peter's action when he was called a "Nazarene" by a maidservant. He denied, with an oath; three times he denied the accusation, with a volley of oaths. And then it went hard with Peter; his own conscience struck him the hardest, and he went out and wept bitterly.

A Bible Society reader in Ireland went among his fellow-countrymen, and began to read the Bible to them. This exposed him to much persecution. On one occasion he was brought into a room by some church dignitaries, and told to swear, with his hand on the mass-book, that he would never again read the Bible in public. One individual threatened to shoot him if he did not take the oath. Unbuttoning his coat, he opened his breast and said: "I am a poor sinner, and fear to offend my God; but here is a heart that never dreaded man."

How a Poor Boy Rose to Fame

THIS is the story of a poor boy, the son of immigrant parents, whose whole career was so remarkable that it might furnish a model to American boys everywhere.

Copyright by Pach Bros.
The Late Governor John A. Johnson

John A. Johnson was born July 28, 1861, in the little town of St. Peter, Minn. He was the son of a Swedish father and mother—both immigrants. They were uneducated Swedes, possessing neither riches nor fame. When he was only six years old he was thoughtful beyond his years, and realized in a measure the heavy burden his mother had to bear in supporting the family and maintaining the home by manual labor, and he determined to help her. His mother did washing for the neighbors, and little John conceived the idea of assisting her by bringing and returning the clothes in a wheelbarrow which he had secured.

He was able to attend the village school only until he was twelve years old, when he was prepared to enter the high school. Then, appreciating the self-sacrifice of his mother, he determined to become the bread-winner of the family and relieve her in a measure of the arduous task of supporting the family single-handed. He was, however, passionately fond of study and spent his evenings in reading books from the library, chiefly those treating of history, biography and travels. His first attempt at earning money was in a general store, where he did odd jobs; later, he obtained a position in a drug store, and after a bitter struggle for ten years to eke out the family's scant income, and at the same time to lay aside small sums to lift the mortgage from their little cottage, he was successful.

His devotion to and care of his mother, displayed so early in life, suffered no diminution until the day of her death, and it is eminently fitting that his last resing-place should be by the side of the mother whom he loved so well.

In the days of Abraham Lincoln, everybody understood that the highest social and political places were open to men of ambition; but later, it was said and believed that the ways of advancement were being closed to those born in poverty and obscurity. The life of Johnson is a refutation of that belief, showing that there is no estate in America so low that it may not grow to be the highest.

Always more or less interested in politics, he was at last free to enter into public life, and he became editor of the St. Peter Herald. In 1898 he was elected State Senator, and served in the Legislature for two sessions, and in 1904 was elected Governor, and took his place as "the man from the plain people." In 1906 he was re-elected, and again in 1908.

His chief traits were his courage and his simplicity. He was courteous, affable, democratic, sturdy, strong and unswerving. He was a good story-teller, but was never known to use a coarse expression. He was not a party leader in politics, yet had great influence; he was not an orator, yet when he talked it was sound common sense; he was not the author of bills, but was able to advise in case of disagreement. His life was typical of the possibilities that lie in front of every young, well-balanced American youth.

Governor Johnson died in what should have been the prime of his life. He was but forty-eight years old, with perhaps the brightest prospects of any man in his party. Had he lived, it is thought by many that he would yet have been the Presidential nominee of the Democratic party in 1912. His death was the result of an operation performed several days carlier, and from which he never rallied. He passed away on September 21, the end coming peacefully, with his wife and other members of his family by his bedside. Thus passed away an honest, efficient public servant, a sincere and faithful worker for the people's good, whose loss is lamented not only in his own State of Minnesota, but by thousands throughout the whole country.

The Ideal Sight Restorer
for 10 days at our expense

THE NORMAL EYE

It helps Nature in a purely natural way to strengthen the eyes and restore the natural vision. Its action is in the nature of a gentle massage, which stimulates the eyes by restoring the normal circulation of blood—that is all that weak eyes require. But it does more—it molds the eye painlessly but surely to its perfect shape. This is necessary to correct near-sight, far-sight, astigmatism, and kindred defects. It is absolutely safe—it does not come in direct contact with the eyes; and five minutes' manipulation, in your own home, twice a day, is all that is necessary to counteract eyestrain and headache, and relegate eyeglasses to the rubbish box. Throw away your eye glasses. See nature, and read with your naked eyes. Write for instructive booklet and 10 days test to THE IDEAL CO., 127K West 65th St., N.Y.

PAINTS ENAMELS THE ACME QUALITY KIND STAINS VARNISHES

Fall Painting Means Winter Comfort

Fall is the time to touch up shabby surfaces in the home, because winter is the time the home is used most. A little money spent now for paints and finishes will make the home brighter, cleaner, more attractive, more wholesome all winter long. Floors, furniture, walls, woodwork, the outside of the house and the roof all should be beautified and protected against winter's moisture, mud and smoke.

It is easy to get the right materials to finish any of these surfaces and to do it right. All that is necessary is to remember the name and to ask your dealer for the ACME QUALITY paint, enamel, stain or varnish prepared for the purpose you have in view.

ACME QUALITY VARNISH—For floors, stairs, woodwork, or refinishing furniture. Gives a smooth, brilliant surface that won't scratch white—one that is sanitary and easy to keep clean and bright.

ACME QUALITY ART WOOD FINISHES are offered in a pleasing variety of artistic stain-effects. A single-coat finish is sufficient on any kind of wood. Easy to apply.

ACME QUALITY PORCH FURNITURE ENAMEL—For finishing Porch and Lawn Chairs, Settees, Lawn Swings, Flower Stands, Railings, etc.

ACME QUALITY SHINGLE STAIN—In various attractive shades. Imparts a handsome finish and is a splendid protective agent against the weather.

If it's a surface to be painted, enameled, stained, varnished or finished in any way, there's an Acme Quality Kind to fit the purpose.

so determinedly for the night, and wrote rapidly. The door of the outer office opened, and the night secretary came in quietly. Miss Holland glanced up, nodded, and wrote on.

When the racing pen paused, he said: "I have been here for some time, but they said you were engaged. Cannot you rest now?"

"Very soon. Charlie, when you go out in the morning, does Mr. Harkness relieve you early to-morrow?"

"At five o'clock."

"Then, can you leave this note for me at Dr. McKenzie's door, and see that it is sent promptly to his room? It is important that he should have it early. Will it hinder you much?"

"Not at all; I have to go that way to look after Williams, and I will see that it reaches the Doctor promptly."

"Ah, yes, Williams—is there something I can do for him?"

It was noticeable that Miss Holland's variation of the stock phrase, "Is there anything I can do," was always that word "something," which took from it its general vagueness.

"Not yet," said the night secretary. "He wants to see you as soon as the doctor will allow him to talk, but that is in the future."

"Poor Williams! I hope he has learned his lesson. It is wonderful that he is pulling through. Tell him that I will come the minute the doctor allows. Now I think I will go home. Is it much after twelve? I meant to be early to-night."

The Rev. Dr. McKenzie opened his eyes to a new day, turned on his pillow, yawned, and considered the feasibility of taking another hour of rest. The day before had been heavy with care, and the one just beginning would probably be quite as full. He was not sure that he felt rested and ready for it.

There was a light tap at his door, and he raised himself on one elbow and considered.

"What is it?" he asked, at length; "and who is it?"

"It is only Denning," said the night secretary. Can I speak to you for just a moment?"

"Come in, Charlie," said the minister, heartily. And, as the door opened, he laughed and held out a cordial hand. "You've caught me—not exactly napping"—he said, "but considering the luxury of it. What have you there?"

"A line from Miss Holland that she wished you to have early. This accounts for my intrusion. I couldn't persuade Jimmy that you ought to be disturbed at so early an hour."

"Jimmy's a jewel, on general principles, without an eye for exceptions," said Dr. McKenzie, reaching for the note. "Have a seat, Charlie. Perhaps these commands need you, too."

He read rapidly, and was smiling in retrospective fashion when he returned the note to its envelope.

"No," he said, "it is only I this time; but I think I'll defer my nap, and proceed to business. Miss Holland has another of her 'unusual cases.'"

Both men laughed. "Did you ever see such a woman?" said the night secretary.

"I never did before," said the minister, promptly; "and I'm afarid I never shall again. They are very rare; God bless them!"

"Amen!" said the night secretary.

Why Irrigation Bonds Are So Popular

The most popular bonds that we handle now are Irrigation Bonds. They have displaced, with a large share of our customers, Municipal, Corporation and Public Utility bonds which pay a lower rate.

When rightly conducted, Irrigation projects now involve no uncertainty. The Government itself is spending tens of millions of dollars in reclaiming this arid land.

The demand for irrigated land exceeds the supply, because of its enormous fertility. And because an unfailing water supply, under constant control, insures one against crop failures.

The most productive and costly farm lands in America are now in the irrigated sections.

Carefully Guarded

The projects which we finance are carefully guarded. Our own engineers and attorneys pass on every feature. An officer of our Company, residing in the West, keeps constantly in touch with every project until the whole work is completed.

We have our pick of these projects, because we are known as the leading dealers in Irrigation bonds. The projects we finance are always well located.

In the past 15 years we have sold 71 separate issues of Reclamation bonds—Drainage and Irrigation—without a dollar of loss to any investor.

The Security

Irrigation bonds are secured by farm liens, given by individual owners in payment for water rights.

These liens are conservative—more so than the usual farm mortgage. They are often for less than one-fourth the land's value.

The first crop from the land is frequently sufficient to pay the whole lien—often by several times over.

In addition, the bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns—the property which the proceeds of the bonds help to build.

Some of these bonds are municipal obligations, issued, like School bonds, by organized districts. Such bonds are tax liens on all the real property in the district.

Some of these bonds are issued subject to the provisions of the Federal law known as the "Carey Act."

The security in all our projects is ideal and ample. It is hard to conceive of anything better.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent interest—a higher rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

The reason is this: Irrigation projects are profitable. There are few undertakings where such amounts of money can be used to equal advantage.

The demand for irrigated land is now overwhelming. And there is great demand for money that will help to supply it. So the bonds pay this liberal rate.

Irrigation bonds are issued in series, usually payable all the way from two to twelve years. One may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

They are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

Ask for Our Book

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds which every investor, small and large, should read. It is based on our intimate knowledge of the facts, gained by 15 years of experience.

Please send this coupon to-day for it. It will enable you to judge if Irrigation bonds form the sort of investment you seek. (4)

CHILDREN SHOWED IT

Effect of Their Warm Drink in the Morning.

"A year ago I was a wreck from coffee drinking and was on the point of giving up my position in the school room because of nervousness.

"I was telling a friend about it and she said: 'We drink nothing at meal time but Postum, and it is such a comfort to have something we can enjoy drinking with the children.'

"I was astonished that she would allow the children to drink any kind of coffee, but she said Postum was the most healthful drink in the world for children as well as for older ones, and that the condition of both the children and adults showed that to be a fact.

"My first trial was a failure. The cook boiled it four or five minutes and it tasted so flat that I was in despair, but determined to give it one more trial. This time we followed the directions and boiled it fifteen minutes after the boiling began. It was a decided success and I was completely won by its rich delicious flavor. In a short time I noticed a decided improvement in my condition and kept growing better and better month after month, until now I am perfectly healthy, and do my work in the school room with ease and pleasure. I would not return to the nerve-destroying regular coffee for any money."

Doubting Castle*

WHEN one reads of the discouragement of men like Job, Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, Elijah, David, and many others among the Scripture saints, we feel a trifle less guilty that we ourselves are sometimes overcome by our troubles. Still, the Gospel of cheerfulness, which we have been taught, was not so much expounded in those days. Men spoke out their feelings simply and honestly, and those feelings were often full of bitterness and despair.

But Doubting Castle, in which the goodness of God is overclouded and hard to believe in; where the promises which upheld the saints are forgotten; and where one is tempted almost to lie down and die, as were Christian and Hopeful—that "home by horror haunted," is a place to flee from the instant a way of escape is opened. Morbid, unwholesome, leading to degeneracy of body, mind and soul, is its atmosphere. There truly dwell the Giant Despair and his wife, who would, perhaps, be better described to our modern ears by the name "Fearfulness," than by that of "Diffidence." One of our publishing houses has cut out from the works of Booker Washington a sentence which is a help to those who find themselves in Doubting Castle. It is printed on an illuminated motto-card and runs something like this: "I am convinced that to every man who lives every day up to the very best he knows will come constantly new and unexpected encouragements."

This is true. Be not cast down. Do "your level best," following your Leader as closely as flesh and blood will let you, and your soul shall be refreshed daily from everlasting springs. The promises are indeed the key which frees you from the dungeon and the rod. Read them and believe.

Ill success in worldly affairs is one fruitful source of sorrow to mankind. It is well in youth to make up one's mind that nothing of this sort matters very much. The richest people are not the happiest. Work as hard as you can, save all you can; and if even then you find yourself poor, do not take it to heart. Remember that Ruskin says: "The only failure a man needs to fear is failure in cleaving to the purpose he knows to be the best." If you fail in that, you cannot escape misery; but even then you can turn from the evil way and start afresh, and God will help you.

In Rosebery's Life of Napoleon, he quotes that wonderful general as saying: "There is a moment in every great war when the bravest troops feel inclined to run; it is the want of confidence in their own courage. The supreme art of generalship is to know just when that moment will come and to provide for it. At Arcola, I won the battle with twenty-five horsemen. I anticipated the moment of fright and flight, and I had twenty-five men ready, of cool nerve and decision, and just at the appropriate moment I turned them into the host, and the battle was won."

By your courage and your timely use of the saving key you may rescue others, as Christian rescued Hopeful.

Longfellow, in his familiar poem on the stars, utters an eloquent apostrophe to "the red planet Mars," which has been so beautiful this fall in our own skies. He calls it "the star of the unconquered will," "serene, resolute and still," and concludes:

> And thou, too, whosoe'er thou art,
> That readest this brief psalm,
> As one by one thy hopes depart,
> Be resolute and calm.
> Oh, fear not in a world like this,
> And thou shalt know ere long,
> Know how sublime a thing it is
> To suffer and be strong.

The Growth of Seed-Truth*

DR. CHARLES H. PARKHURST, in one of his most powerful sermons, draws an analogy between the vegetable seed and the soul. The plant-seed is "endowed with an instinct that points its way toward the sky. Its tendency is to grow, and to grow upward." So it is with the soul. "It is tipped with a heavenward yearning. Its tendency is also to grow up. It is a part of our original equipment to be something, and to be it more and more—to work up—as it is the law of the oak to do, and of the pansy."

But many of these soul-seeds never develop. They are "full of the beginnings of growth, but void of continuings; lives that flutter, but do not fly; to whom deeds, as they do them, are like jumbled letters of the alphabet, that spell out no particular meaning; deeds that are not a part of history, and are, therefore, unflavored by the great meanings of broad times and large events."

If we are to really develop our souls, we must not only strive for petty personal ends; we must, to use Emerson's now rather worn expression, "Hitch our wagon to a star." We must identify ourselves with some great world movement for the betterment of mankind—the great temperance movement, the great prison reform movement, that for purer politics, and especially that for spreading the knowledge of the Gospel, and which we call the missionary movement. Every life is dignified by a connection with a noble and all-embracing "cause." It tends to enlarge heart and mind. It quickens the sensibilities and strengthens the intellect.

The parable which forms a part of this lesson hints at the prime way in which the Gospel is to be preached. Not only must we talk it, but we must do it. Christ not only said to the unclean spirit, "Depart," but he staid by the demented man and forced the demons to leave him.

It is the duty of the Christian not only to study the Word of God and to acquaint others with it, but to see that the demons which haunt every department of human life are banished, so far as any one man can do it. He may feel most the needs of the distant heathen, and may sail the seas to minister to strange foreign peoples. He may find borne in most upon his soul the needs of his own town or city. He may burn with the shame of its corrupt government, and may nerve himself to battle with the sin in its high places. Or the awful intemperance on every side may rouse him more deeply than any other issue, and to the abolition of that he may pledge his life.

But, though they may seem to be different, these are all only departments of the same great cause; simply varying forms of the Christ-Gospel, which every Christian should be fighting to spread. Merely going to church and perhaps teaching in the Sunday School, paying tithes into the treasury and subscribing to a religious journal, are not enough. Lay your hand to the plough, and help to perform these hard and trying duties out in the world.

George Matheson expresses the thought well in one of his beautiful prayers: "Lord, give me an expanded view of what it is to be religious. Teach me that the road to Emmaus is broad enough to hold many travelers. Let me see into what unlikely road stretches the street of gold. Let me see there the leper that I loathed, the demoniac that I despised, the sceptic that I scorned, the fallen that I flouted. Plant the cross in the middle of the highway, until between the church and the market place there shall be no more sea."

"The Highest Place"

IT may be wrong, and yet I would not be
An angel, formed in spotless purity;
It may seem strange, yet with my sins and cares
I would not change my lot in Christ for theirs.
They in the light of God will ever glow,
Yet joys are mine that they can never know.

They, since He made them first, have ever been Viewing His love, no earthly veil between;
In that, from age to age, they still abide,
Drink of its fulness and are satisfied;
Yet even they bend down new depths to see,
New depths of love, the love that ransomed me.

Sweet are their songs, yet not to them is given
To sing the song of the redeemed in heaven.
Bright are their crowns, their harps are shining gold,
Yet, in their hands no victor's palm they hold;
No wreath they wear such as shall clasp the brow
Of those who pass through tribulation now.

Their robes are white, yet they shall fade beside
The robes that Jesus' blood has purified.
They near him stand, but for His Bride alone
Remains the place the nearest to the throne;
To her alone it shall be given to rest
Upon His arm, and lean upon His breast!

Blest thought! each conflict here, each bitter strife,
Shall but add sweetness to the cup of life;
Each heavy stroke shall but God's child prepare
To be a pillar in His temple there;
There, where the things which darkly now I see
Shall be in perfect light revealed to me.

ANON.

A Fourteen-Year-Old Hero

A REMARKABLE case of bravery has been brought to our notice by Mr. C. M. Killian, of Valdosta, Ga. Three boys were driving on a street crossed by three railroads when the horse became frightened and ran away at a thirty-mile rate. John Elder, the young driver, with remarkable presence of mind, held on with a bull-dog grip, guiding the animal as near the middle of the street as possible, out of the way of other vehicles, thus escaping all serious injury to themselves or others. Young Elder's pluck and presence of mind doubtless saved three lives, and he is now regarded as a boy hero in Valdosta.

Workers at Home and Abroad

—CROSSLEY AND HUNTER have just closed their twenty-fifth year in evangelistic work. They are the Moody and Sankey of Canada. During these long years they have held about three hundred campaigns, and have been used in bringing multitudes into the Christian life. Though veterans in the work, they are youthful in spirit and vigorous in the fight.

—MISS STELLA HARTFORD, missionary, Moulmein, Burma, India, writes: "I wonder if any of your readers has a copy, new or old, of From the Manger to the Cross, that they would be willing to give to a native pastor—a most earnest, consecrated man, now working among the Karens in Siam. He understands English well. If any one wants further particulars, please write to me."

—REV. T. WALKUP, an American missionary in charge of the mission schooner Hiram Bingham, was shipwrecked in a tropical squall near the Caroline Islands, in the Pacific Ocean, on May 4. With Dr. Walkup were eight natives. All got into a boat, and for twenty-one days were at the mercy of wind and waves. Some became insane through hunger and thirst. The boat finally landed on Edon Island, on May 26. Mr. Walkup died soon after landing, and was buried on the beach.

—OTTO F. YOUNGS, of the old Jerry McAuley Mission, New York, who was actively associated with that work until the time of his death, passed away September 10. He had been a faithful and successful leader in the meetings for many years. When he first entered the doors of the mission he was a victim of strong drink, and had lost home, friends, position and everything that life held dear. After his conversion God used him greatly in leading men to Jesus.

—REV. ALFRED DE BARRITT stated at a recent reunion of the students, past and present, of the Presbyterian School in Cienfuegos, Cuba, that he has placed over two hundred young people in Christian schools in North America. If each of these spends only $400 for education, travel, etc., they have spent $80,000 in the aggregate. Notwithstanding this fact, he added, the school in Cienfuegos has no building, simply a rented house, with no modern equipment whatever.

—THE RESCUE MISSION WORKERS are getting better acquainted with each other through the National Federation of Gospel Missions. Two annual conventions have been held in New York and Jersey City, and three district conventions at different places. At a district convention in Reading, Pa., October 4 to 10, a chorus of eight hundred voices sings at the evening meetings in the Auditorium, which seats 3,000. Pastors of various denominations take part. At the evening meetings Messrs. Madison, Fretz, Wyburn, Raws, McIntyre and Ruben and Misses Wray, Angel and others are the speakers.

Quaker Oats popularity. Why?

Here are a few instances that indicate why Quaker Oats is and deserves to be the most popular food.

Sometime ago a mother with a puny little baby that couldn't retain food long enough for assimilation, made a thin porridge of Quaker Oats, cooked it thoroughly, strained it and fed the baby. Every baby in reach or that mother's voice or pen is eating Quaker Oats porridge because of the health and strength it brought to her baby.

It has been observed that school children who eat a hearty breakfast of Quaker Oats are never among those who show signs of great fatigue in their work in the class room.

The experiments with athletes in one of our great universities in 1908 proved absolutely that such food as Quaker Oats gives strrength and endurance far beyond that secured by the eaters of meat.

It costs about ten cents a week to supply three persons with Quaker Oats breakfasts every day.

WHEN DINNER COMES

One Ought to Have a Good Appetite.

A good appetite is the best sauce. It goes a long way toward helping in the digestive process, and that is absolutely essential to health and strength.

Many persons have found that Grape-Nuts food is not only nourishing but is a great appetizer. Even children like the taste of it and grow strong and rosy from its use.

It is especially the food to make a weak stomach strong and create an appetite for dinner.

"I am 57 years old," writes a Tenn. grandmother, "and have had a weak stomach from childhood. By great care as to my diet I enjoyed a reasonable degree of health, but never found anything to equal Grape-Nuts as a standby.

'When I have no appetite for breakfast and just eat to keep up my strength, I take 4 teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with good rich milk, and when dinner comes I am hungry, while if I go without any breakfast I never feel like eating dinner. Grape-Nuts for breakfast seems to make a healthy appetite for dinner.

"My little 13-months-old grandson had been very sick with stomach trouble during the past summer, and finally we put him on Grape-Nuts. Now he is growing fat and well. When asked if he wants his nurse or Grape-Nuts, he brightens up and points to the cupboard. He was no trouble to wean at all—thanks to Grape-Nuts." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

A Tour in the Southern Highlands

By EDW. O. GUERRANT, Wilmore, Kentucky

AFTER a long time, and over a rough road, I made my third visit lately to the Great Smoky Mountains, which divide Tennessee from North Carolina. The evening of the second day I reached Brown's, a little station on the rapid Pigeon River, some twenty miles above Newport, Tenn. With the only horse in the neighborhood, I climbed 500 feet in two miles, up to the Seminary of the Great Smokies, where I found Miss Margaret Gordon and her mother. They have charge of this mission. There was no appointment for preaching until nearly night, when a good congregation nearly filled the chapel. Where they came from one could only guess, for few houses were visible in these wild, steep mountains. I preached three times the next day to most earnest congregations, every one of whom walked; and a number made confession of Christ.

The postoffice at the Seminary is kept by one of the grown pupils, who told me his salary was $4 per month, which nearly paid his board. A tall Highlander carried the mail on his shoulder to the railroad, which consisted of two letters and three postals that day. He carries it three times a week. This seminary, built by Mr. Barrows, is a monument to the energy and consecrated zeal of a noble man and his wife. Rev. Mr. Gordon and Mr. E. M. Munroe, Jr., have preached there during the summer.

I left early on Thursday morning for the Ebenezer Mission, seven miles back of Del Rio, on the French Broad River. From the seminary we had to descend to the river, down a roaring cataract, which an enterprising Highlander had harnessed to a little mill, where his few neighbors could get their grinding done. My guide informed me that the mill cost about $10. Money is scarce in these mountains. At Del Rio I met Miss Leona Blake, of South Carolina, on her way to the mission. Mr. Munroe met us at Del Rio with a horse and mule, to carry us seven miles up Big Creek and across the mountain to the Ebenezer Home. We reached there at dark, after Miss Blake's horse had thrown her over his head, and then she "traded" him for my mule, after which we went safely. We found this mission, founded by two devoted Moravians, now in China, in a flourishing condition and hopeful of greater things. It is admirably managed by Miss Margaret Allison, of North Carolina, ably assisted by Mr. Marshall Munroe, Jr., of Texas, and Miss Annie Laurie Williams, of South Carolina. On Saturday, Sabbath and Monday, we had preaching twice daily, and to fine congregations. At night the chapel was crowded, and on Sabbath morning the Sunday School filled the chapel, dining-room and porch. I do not know when I ever saw a finer lot of Highland lads and lassies. More than a score of persons professed faith in the Saviour. Miss Williams' school was almost unanimous in accepting Christ.

Tuesday morning Mr. Richard James brought me a mule to ride back to Del Rio, nine miles by his home, on the Muddy Fork of the Big Creek. Here I found the coziest cottage and prettiest cove I have yet seen in the Great Smokies. Mr. James generously offered to give us fifteen acres of land, and other help from the neighbors, if we would give them better advantages of education and religion. We visited the schoolhouse over the mountain, and found it filled with bright children, taught by a nice young lady, in a poor, open log cabin, which could not be warmed. The school is to last for four months, if Jack Frost does not close it sooner. These highlands are the nursery and training ground of our country. No wonder their ancestors won the battles of King's Mountain and New Orleans!

Next morning I took the train east to Watauga Hills, where I met Rev. R. F. King, the faithful bishop of the "Forks," where he has built a church on a spot where I preached, some years ago, to people seated on the ground. Here I also met the veterans of the Soul-Winners' Society, Mr. and Mrs. Parmelee, who ten years ago entered the work in "Bloody Breathitt" County, in the Kentucky Cumberlands.

For all these self-denying missionaries we ask the help of your prayers and alms. They are worthy of both. They labor in the "regions beyond" churches, with no hope of reward, but the approval of a good conscience and of the King whom they serve.

MR. MOODY APPEALS FOR NORTHFIELD

THE Northfield Schools are in need of help. For the first time in several years the treasurers have reported a deficit in running expenses for the year ending July 31. This we must meet at once, and are therefore making an urgent appeal for funds. To meet our current expenses for this year, and wipe out the arrearages of last season, we need $100,000. Northfield Seminary and Mount Hermon Boys' School were founded nearly a generation ago, and they are known as the Northfield Schools. They have an aggregate enrolment of over 800 students, coming from every section of the country. Originally established for poor but self-reliant young men and young women, who are seeking the advantages of an education of which they have been deprived in early years, these schools have kept true to their original purpose, and are still keeping their charges at the nominal sum of $100 a year, which is one-half the actual cost for board and tuition.

While the increased cost of living yearly adds to the burden that must be made up by our friends, we do not feel that we can increase our student charges. Our experience has shown that to do so would be to close the door upon those in whose behalf the work was established. We must, therefore, urgently appeal to friends throughout the country for their help. May we seek the help of your readers? Contributions of any sum whatever will be most gratefully appreciated, and should be sent to the undersigned.

Purity Essential

In no other form of food is Purity so absolutely essential as in milk products. Richness is also necessary, as without richness, milk is of little value as a food. Purity and richness are the embodiment of Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. As a food for infants or for general household purposes it has no equal.

The National Roller Bearing Carpet Sweeper

IS AS big an improvement over other carpet sweepers as they are an improvement over the broom. The National is the final perfection of the carpet-sweeper idea. It is the only carpet sweeper made with successful roller bearings. That makes it twice as easy to run as any other. It's the only sweeper that's "spill-proof." For the National has a special, exclusive anti-tipping device --- no chance of its over-balancing and spilling the dirt, whatever happens. And the broom action of the National is different from any other sweeper --- more positive.

The improved brush is made of genuine Hankow Chinese bristles. We import them ourselves --- know what we are getting. We use only the short, full tufts ---the best dirt-gatherers. They pick up every speck, scrap, string, or raveling.

You will find in no other sweeper the National's patented brush release. A second's finger touch, and out comes the brush ready for cleaning.

Every National Roller-Bearing Sweeper---whatever the price --- has all these and many other special points. Nationals will wear years longer than any other kind--- and are fully warranted.

Awarded Grand Prize and two Gold Medals at St. Louis Exposition. It will pay you to find out all about the National at your dealer's.

HOLSTEIN MILK
For Both Mother and Baby

¶ If you have a new baby, of course you will nurse it, for, "Remember, there is nothing as good for the baby as mother's milk."

¶ If you will drink the milk of the large, vigorous Holstein Cow, you cannot help imparting vitality to baby as well as gaining strength yourself. This seems a simple way to get strong. Try it. It costs little and you will find yourself gaining rapidly, as well as your baby.

¶ If you do not nurse your baby, drink Holstein Milk yourself, and get your physician to tell you how to modify it for baby. If baby is well and strong it will probably not need modifying. Nearly all milk supply stations, laboratories, sanitariums, hospitals, etc., use Holstein Milk exclusively for infant and invalid feeding. Many of them have their own herds of Holsteins.

Our little book, "The Story of Holstein Milk," has a fund of information in it, and we are pleased to send it on request.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Centennial Poet*

IT is a fitting thing that a part of the great centennial celebration for Abraham Lincoln should be the republication of the thousand-dollar prize poem, written in response to the New York Herald's generous offer of some years ago. The poem ranks high above the usual prize product, and contains many fine lines and stanzas. It is, in a sense, a history of the emotions of the Civil War. After an invocation comes a poem descriptive of the rise of the freedom-thought, as it gradually developed through the ages, and bloomed in the New World. The beginning of African slavery is also pictured. Then a shadow lowers. The forces of liberty and the "scions of sophistry," who saw not

Within the negro's ebon face,
The image of Almighty God,

are gradually approaching the irrepressible conflict. Then rises "the Star of Sangamon," as Mr. Allen, by a slightly strained figure, hardly descriptive, calls Lincoln. In this poem occur some fine lines. The next lyric shows him as capturing the hearts of the people. Then he sees and measures the awful storm which is gathering, as he sits upon "his high and sacred seat," waiting the clear word,

Which God's true seers at last have ever heard.

The nation awakens. Mr. Allen well depicts the response of the people to the call to arms:

It rang o'er the startled land,
One sovereign blast of command.
It rolled from sea unto sea,
The summons of Liberty.
It broke 'gainst the scintillant hills,
Resounding in multiple thrills
Of wakening thunder. It swept Through valleys and over streams,
The militant havoc of dreams
Of troubled millions that slept.
It stirred all hearts, as it went,
Arousing a continent.

Memorial Day is celebrated in a finely sustained apostrophe to the dead. The later warriors are not forgotten; and the volume closes with a pæan of rejoicing over the attainment of a glorious peace:

The bitter is changed to sweet;
The bruises of battle heal;
And Peace stands again at the wheel,
And turns it with glowing feet.

One Union never to fall;
One Freedom never to cease;
One ineffaceable Peace;
One Flag afloat over all.

New York: The Gospel Publishing House, 54 West Twenty-second Street. $1. This book is packed full of almost sensational adventures and anecdotes. Its author, though evidently unacquainted with the refinements of literary style, has a keen eye for a point and can make a story interesting. A preface by the late Dr. Selah Merrill vouches for Mr. Forder's sincerity and his great usefulness as a missionary. He is another of the considerable army of missionaries led into the work through the preaching of Robert Moffat

Paul Before Felix

By Mrs. M. Baxter

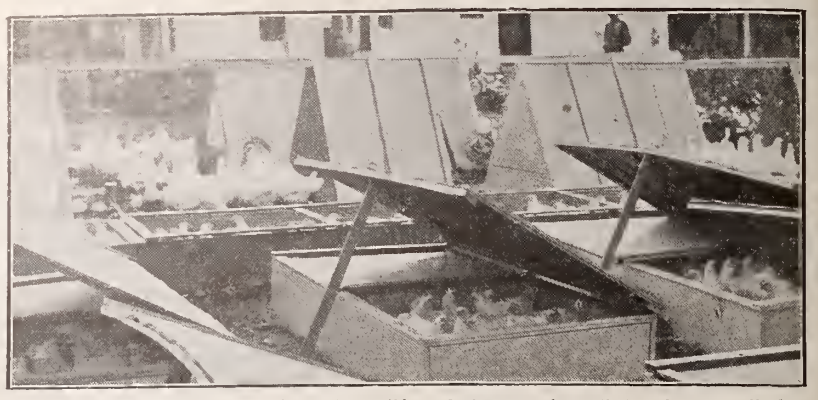
THE Jews were not long in coming to the charge against Paul. The chief priest came down to Cæsarea in person, and, in order to strengthen his cause, he brought with him, besides the elders, a popular orator named Tertullus, thinking, no doubt, by this means to gain his cause and work Paul's destruction. This hireling, whose ready utterance could serve any cause which answered best for his own interest, after a fulsome flattery of the governor (a man living in open sin), began to accuse Paul. In all his charge there was nothing to prove that Paul had broken one single law, civil or ecclesiastical.

The governor beckoned Paul to speak. Paul stood before Felix for God's cause, not his own, and he told out the simple facts as they were, saying what God led him to say and no more. He told how twelve days previously he had gone "up to Jerusalem for to worship," how that the Jews found him in the temple, neither "disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogues nor in the city. Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me." Here was his simple answer. No amount of eloquence or declamation can establish an accusation against a man if no proof of it can be found. "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets." "I worship the God of my fathers, believing." This was Paul's confession: "I hold as real, and treat as real, all which God says; this they call heresy." Yes, this is what the majority of professing Christians throughout the world call heresy. That which was mere doctrine to the Jews was life, power and experience to Paul; that which to them was "the letter" which "killeth," was to him the Spirit which giveth life. He believed the same things as they did, their Scriptures were his, but to him Christ filled them all, and they could not see Christ in them anywhere. So is it now; after the way which men call heresy, we trust Jesus dwelling in us by faith to keep us really from sin, and we find he does, so that sin does not have dominion over us (Rom. 6:14). We trust the Holy Spirit dwelling in us to quicken our mortal bodies (not our dead bodies in the resurrection merely, but our mortal bodies down here) "by his Spirit that dwelleth in us"; dwelleth now in us. And we trust the Holy Ghost to apply to us the blessed fact that Jesus took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses. This men call heresy, but it is only the Word of God taken as real, as meaning just what it says.

Speaking of the resurrection, Paul said, "I have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." To Paul the resurrection was a fact. Felix had no particular interest in the trial; he was not a man of God, and he had no object to attain in specially favoring the Jewish elders, so he deferred them and said, "When Lysias, the chief captain [the only party against whom any substantial charge had been laid] shall come down I will hear the uttermost of your matter." All this time God's hand was at work overruling men and circumstances, and working out his own ends for Paul and for the truth. Felix commanded a centurion to keep Paul and to let him have liberty, to "forbid none of his acquaintances to minister or to come unto him." Paul had many acquaintances at Cæsarea, and his being a state prisoner would not prevent their coming to him to learn of God. Thus the Lord gave him a place of ministry.

A LIVING FROM POULTRY

$1,500 from 60 Hens in 10 Months on a City Lot 40 Feet Square



To the average poultryman that would seem impossible, and when we tell you that we have actually done a $1,500 poultry business with 60 hens on a corner in the city garden 40 feet wide by 40 feet long we are simply stating facts. It would not be possible to get such returns by any one of the systems of poultry keeping recommended and practiced by the American people, still it is an easy matter when the new PHILO SYSTEM is adopted.

The Philo System is Unlike All Other Ways of Keeping Poultry and in many respects just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible, and getting unheard-of results that are hard to believe without seeing.

The New System Covers All Branches of the Work Necessary for Success
from selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner.

Two Pound Broilers in Eight Weeks
are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler without any loss, and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing here three cents per pound above the highest market price.

Our Six-Months-Old Pullets are Laying at the Rate of 24 Eggs Each Per Month
in a space of two square feet for each bird. No green-cut bone of any description is fed, and the food used is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, the Philo System of Poultry Keeping, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and 15 pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

Don't Let the Chicks Die in the Shell
One of our secrets of success is to save all the chickens that are fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick and believed to be the secret of the ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen.

Three-Pound Roasters Ten Weeks Old

Chicken Feed at 15 Cents a Bushel
Our book tells how to make the best green food with but little trouble and have a good supply, any day in the year, winter or summer. It is just as impossible to get a large egg yield without green food as it is to keep a cow without hay or fodder.

Our New Brooder Saves 2 Cents on Each Chicken
No lamp required. No danger of chilling, over-heating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all the lice off the chickens automatically or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of 25 to 50 Cents.

TESTIMONIALS

205 S. Clinton St., Baltimore, Md., May 28, 1909.
E. R. Philo, Publisher, Elmira, N.Y.

Dear Sir: I have embarked in the poultry business on a small scale (Philo System) and am having the best of success so far, sixty-eight per cent of eggs hatched by hens, all chicks alive and healthy at this writing; they are now three weeks old. Mr. Philo is a public benefactor, and I don't believe his System can be improved upon, and so I am now looking for more yard room, having but 15x30 where I am now. Yours truly,
C. H. Leach.

South Britain, Conn., Ap. 14, 1909.
Mr. E. R. Philo, Elmira, N.Y.

Dear Sir: I have followed your System as close as I could; the result is a complete success. If there can be any improvement on nature, your Brooder is it. The first experience I had with your System was last December. I hatched 17 chicks under two hens, put them as soon as hatched in one of your Brooders out of doors, and at the age of three months I sold them at 35c. a pound. They then averaged 2½ lbs. each, and the man I sold them to said they were the finest he ever saw, and he wants all I can spare this season. Yours truly,
A. E. Nelson.

Osakis, Minn., June 7, '09.
Mr. E. R. Philo, Elmira, N.Y.

Dear Sir: You certainly have the greatest System the world has ever known. I have had experience with poultry, but I know you have the System that brings the real profits.
Yours, Jesse Underwood.

Brockport, N.Y., Sept. 12, 1908.
Mr. E. R. Philo, Elmira, N.Y.

Dear Sir: I have had perfect success brooding chickens your way. I think your method will raise stronger, healthier chicks than the old way of using lamps, and besides it saves so much work and risk. Yours respectfully,
M. S. Gooding.

Send $1.00 direct to the publisher, and a copy of the latest revised edition of the book will be sent you by return mail.

Help Needed at Northfield

NORTHFIELD SEMINARY AND MT. HERMON BOYS' SCHOOL were founded a generation ago for poor boys and girls. To "help those who help themselves," every student was charged half the actual cost for board and tuition. A healthful spirit of self-dependence was fostered in the student, who also came to appreciate the cost of the advantages enjoyed.

For thirty years this policy of administration has been faithfully adhered to, and the consequent deficit has been met by contributions from those in sympathy with the founder, Mr. D. L. Moody, and what he stood for.

The work has steadily grown, till now there are over eight hundred students. They are chosen out of hundreds of applicants, as representing in need and merit the class for whom the work was established.

A special need exists this year in view of the recent financial depression. To raise our student charges would be to exclude our most deserving students. It is necessary, therefore, to seek more friends. Heretofore the work has been largely dependent upon many donations of moderate amount, and at this time of special need we turn to those who sympathize with the object and methods of the work.

Contributions of whatever amount will be gratefully received and promptly acknowledged by treasurer's receipt and may be addressed to

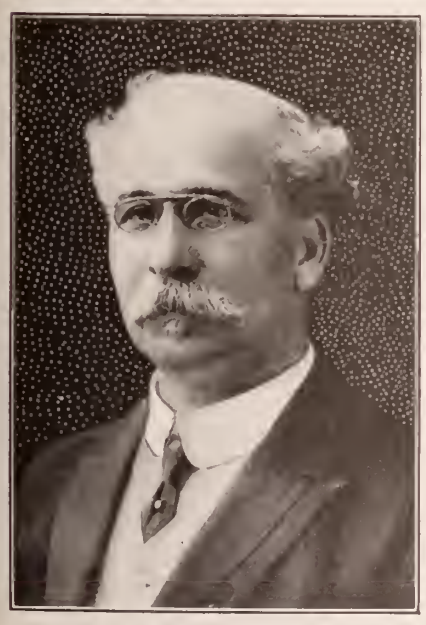
An English Evangelist's Visit

REV. ROBERT S. BRADBROOK, a preacher who is now in this country conducting special evangelistic campaigns, was born in London, England, in 1857. After leaving school, he became a sailor and, after nine years at sea, he decided to settle ashore. He was persuaded by the young lady who afterward became his wife to attend religious services. Under the ministry of Rev. John Vaughan he was converted, and soon afterward engaged in Christian work.



Evangelist Bradbrook

While attending to business he devoted his spare time to preaching and to the formation of Christian Endeavor Societies, and temperance work, as well as in children's services, under the auspices of the London Sunday School Union.

Feeling powerfully drawn to independent evangelistic work, he resolved to devote the whole of his time and energies to preaching and singing. He had meanwhile taken a theological course. Many doors were soon open, and his labors were greatly blessed.

For the past six years he has held the pastorate of Alexandria Hall, Southeast London, which he relinquished for the purpose of returning to evangelistic work in this country. He was selected by the Pittsburg Evangelistic Committee to conduct their tent campaign during August. Some striking incidents are recorded of the work during that period. He preached in the prisons on Sundays; also to men's mass meeting every Sunday afternoon, and in the hall of the Y. M. C. A. daily during August.

Mr. Bradbrook has had an eventful life. He has a stirring story to tell of numerous adventures on sea and land, dealing with facts of his own personal experience in various parts of the world. These illustrated talks have been given in connection with special missions in England to audiences numbering tens of thousands. Churches, Y. M. C. A.'s and other organizations can communicate with Evangelist Bradbrook by addressing him in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City.

What Will You Give To Be Well

To Have Good Figure, Vibrant Health, Rested Nerves?

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 43,000 women in the past seven years. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles and to my 12 years' personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty. If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work.

I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness, which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the vivacity which makes you

A Better Wife
A Rested Mother
A Sweeter Sweetheart

I teach you to stand and to walk in an attitude which bespeaks culture and refinement. A good figure gracefully carried means more than a pretty face. Nature's rosy cheeks are more beautiful than paint or powder.

Too Fleshy? You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced over 25,000 women. One pupil writes me:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 ponnds and I look 15 years younger. I have reduced those hips and I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now. When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh, dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Arise to Your Best

In the privacy of your own room, I strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lungs and heart, and start your blood to circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breath so that the blood is fully purified. I help you to arise to your best.

To Thin? I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil was who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms. My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

The day for drugging the system has passed. The strength of vital organs gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as

Constipation Rheumatism Irritability Nervousness
Torpid Liver Weaknesses Weak Nerve Sleeplessness
Indigestion Dullness Catarrh

This is accomplished by strengthening whatever organs or nerves are weak. I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in your own home.

If you will tell me your faults in health or figure, I will cheerfully tell you about my work and if I cannot help your particular case, I will tell you so. I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands. Send 10 cents for instructive booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly.

THE FAMOUS "DREAMLAND" PICTURE

How we Discovered the Picture which Illustrates Our Exceptionally Attractive Calendar for 1910. Our 1910 "Dreamland" Calendar is a PHOTOGRAVURE (not simply black and white), and Measures 18 x 21 inches.

THE management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is ever on the lookout for some delightful surprise for the members of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. Sometimes it is in the shape of a Calendar; at other times it is a book, or perhaps a superb collection of choice Art Pictures; and not infrequently two or more surprises are provided.

This year we have been exceptionally fortunate. While in Europe, on his way to an audience with His Majesty Victor Emmanuel III., the King of Italy, Dr. Klopsch discovered a picture practically unknown in America, but greatly admired in European art circles, entitled "Dreamland." It was painted by Professor F. Charderon, the famous French artist, and at once commanded the attention of art connoisseurs.

The beauty of this veritable masterpiece so impressed Dr. Klopsch that he decided to purchase a copy and negotiate for its reproduction in this country. But the only copy which seemed to most accurately reproduce the genius of the artist was framed and the dealer insisted that he would not sell the picture unless at the same time he sold the frame. But the frame was too large to pack, and the negotiations for its purchase nearly fell through, when an offer was made to pay the full price asked if the dealer would agree to deliver the picture without the frame, securely wrapped for safe transportation. This was acceptable, and the picture became our property.

It was impossible, however, to arrange in Europe for its use in America. The house in Paris could not consider the matter; it would have to be done in New York, at the accredited American agency for the firm.

On the return of Dr. Klopsch to New York steps were immediately taken with a view to securing the right to reproduce the picture, but the New York house contended that the matter would have to be referred to the main office in Paris. So the next step was in that direction. After a month's delay or more, the privilege was granted; but when the license authorizing us to reproduce "Dreamland" was received it was noted that the right extended only to its reproduction in our columns.

Hence other measures were initiated and another delay ensued, but this time, much to our delight, we were successful. On the payment of four times the amount first agreed upon we received permission to use "Dreamland" in connection with our Calendar.

Our superb Photogravure reproduction, on India Tint Ivory Finish Art Paper, is more than excellent. While the subject itself is one of rare beauty, its striking attractiveness is greatly enhanced by the soft richness, velvet texture, exquisite true values and mellow tint, which find charming expression in this Splendid Achievement of the Engraver's Art.

The above Miniature reproduction in black and white cannot give more than a vague idea of the beautiful picture which adorns our 1910 Calendar. This Calendar measures 18x21 inches, and wherever displayed it will at once attract the eye of every Art Lover, and all who have any appreciation for genuine beauty.

Words fail to express our gratification at being in a position to afford to our subscribers such a real treat, and we believe that thousands of letters will reach us breathing the gratitude that all who receive this Calendar will feel in their hearts toward the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

This Calendar will be sent FREE, all charges prepaid, to every new and renewal subscriber, uncreased and undamaged delivery guaranteed.

Deliveries will be made in the order in which new subscriptions or renewals are received. The First Edition is now in course of completion, and will be ready in a few days.

A Feature of this Calendar is the Size and Legibility of the Dates, which Stand Out LARGE and CLEAR.

KATE UPSON CLARK

Says of Our "Dreamland" Calendar:

Among the thousands of beautiful pictures which have appeared in recent years we believe our readers will agree that this sleeping child is the most artistic and the most charming.

The crude harshness of line which mars so many works of this kind is utterly absent from this superb photogravure. The softness and delicacy of the reproduction are entirely worthy of the beauty and distinction of the subject, and must appeal at once to the cultivated eye.

This exquisite picture would adorn the stateliest mansion. It will decorate and refine the humblest cottage. Any home will be rendered more attractive and more delightful by its presence.

Scarcely once in a lifetime can so fair and flower-like a figure be obtained. Purity and peace breathe from the face of the sleeping child. Every one who looks upon it feels a sense of calm and repose. No home should be without it, and none need be without it.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Says of Our "Dreamland" Calendar:

"There is not a Mother, or, for that matter, a Grandmother, in this wide land, from coast to coast, who will not want the 'Dreamland' Calendar for her own, as soon as she sees it. The artist has chosen an ecstatic moment in home life, when the household darling, weary with play, has been caught in the toils of slumber. Here she lies, every muscle relaxed, the dimpled hands and the dancing feet quiet in repose. It is all one can do to keep from dropping a kiss on the rosy cheek. We must not do that, for we might waken the baby and call her back from Dreamland.

"The 'Dreamland' Calendar will lend an additional touch of grace to the family living room. It will win a smile from the tired father, who cares as much for the little maid as the mother herself. Here is our darling fast asleep. Sleeping or waking, she is the joy of the house.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has offered its readers many beautiful Calendars, but this one surpasses all former productions."

The "Reception of Stuyvesant," a Float of the Dutch Period

"Peace and Liberty," one of the Finest of the Floats

MILLIONS SEE THE GREAT CELEBRATION

"WELL, I have seen several miles of our country's history," remarked one visitor to the Hudson-Fulton celebration, after witnessing the magnificent parade of floats, "and it was well worth the trip to see it, if I miss everything else." This was the thought in the minds of the two million people who had filled the grandstands, stood in solid ranks from curbs to housefronts, climbed on fences and leaned out of windows and over the edge of roofs at dangerous angles for three hours to see the historical pageant, the preparations for which extended over a year.

It rained hard during the night, and many an anxious eye was cast at the sky, which threatened to spoil the work of months, but it cleared during the morning and by one o'clock the sun shone brightly down on streets filled with crowds hurrying to see re-enacted the stirring events of the days "when old New York was young."

The parade started promptly on its six-mile line of march. The floats, of course, were the main attractions, the marchers merely acting as escorts, but these also came in for their share of the applause. There were Indians in war paint and feathers, Italians in the gaudy uniforms of King Victor's country, Irishmen following the green banners of Erin, and fifteen or twenty other nationalities.

The Hungarians, in their plumed fur caps and shining boots with laced tops, were probably the most picturesque; and the kilted Highlanders, swinging along in close ranks to the shriek of the great warpipes, the most martial.

Only the front rows of the crowds could see the escorts, but all could see the tableaux on the floats, as they were elevated on high trucks, each drawn by four horses, in red blankets trimmed with gilt.

The first float which caused the spectators to break into admiring ahs! and ohs! was one of a gigantic Indian head-dress, resting on a pile of Indian maize. The feathers of the great head-piece flaunted far above the heads of the real Indians, who stood, like figures resurrected from the historic past, at the back of the float. Then there was shown the legend of Hiawatha—a great eagle bending above the form of the fallen brave. Warriors were grouped upon the towering crags behind, while Indian maidens sat in the birchen canoe below.

Each division had a title car, showing in an allegorical way the period which was to follow. That of the Colonial Period showed a rocky fortress, bristling with a tier of guns; drooping standards, "crimson and blue," of "the mistress of the seas," and great stacks of cases representing commerce. Those who thought the romantic and picturesque events of history had all happened in the Old World were now fast losing the idea. Bronch, in his palisaded house, was signing his treaty with the Indians, while warriors were selling to velvet-coated and beplumed adventurers the title to Manhattan for trinkets worth $23.

One of the oddest floats was that showing old-time punishments. A scold—a papier maché figure in this case—was being ducked with much enthusiasm in a well. At the corners two patriotic citizens had consented to stand in the pillory and the stocks to help make a New York holiday, to paraphrase the famous saying.

The float "When New Amsterdam Became New York" presented a scene marking a turning point in the country's history. At the back stood the grim walls of the Colonial fortress. In front stood, mingled, the retiring troops of Holland and the musketeers of England. Above the bastion floated the crimson cross of St. George, which had just been raised. Drummers, in steel morions and buff coats, were sounding a saluting ruffle. The float was manned entirely by college students, and they took their parts admirably and wore their heavy equipments as if they were the kind of clothes they wore to classes every day. Soon the approach of figures in buff and blue and the white and red announced scenes from the War for Independence, and in a few moments the Continentals were storming Stony Point, Martinus Willet was capturing arms on Broad Street, Nathan Hale was being tried, and the Pauldings had just captured André. Washington taking leave of his officers, and taking the oath of office, brought a thundering cheer from the crowds.

A partial description of the floats was given in last week's issue.

The next day the aeronauts were striving for the mastery of the air, and two days later thirty thousand troops paraded down Fifth Avenue, drawing again a crowd of sightseers, whose home addresses included every town from Maine to California. Receptions in the city and celebrations along the Hudson concluded the festivities.

A SERMON BY

GOD'S COUNTRY

TEXT: Isa. 26: 1, 2—"In that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah; We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks. Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in."

"O H, that's God's country!" The words were uttered by an Englishman, a yeoman in corduroys, whom I casually met at the annual fair in Warwickshire, years ago. As I stood leaning on one of the barriers, watching the passing show, I was sensible of his gaze intently fixed upon me. He saw, at length, that I resented it and made his apology on this wise: "I beg your pardon, sir; my offense was quite unintended. The fact is, you are an American; and in my early life I passed six years ranching in Colorado. It was just homesickness for America that made me stare at you. I came back here to marry my wife, and settle down as an English farmer; but, bless you, that's God's country, and I am thinking I'll never be happy till I get back to it."

A few weeks later, on the upper deck of an ocean liner, a group of returning tourists and expatriates stood waiting for the morning mist to scatter, that they might catch sight of land. Presently they saw it, Sandy Hook in the distance, and one exclaimed, "Ah, that is God's country!" And there was dew on his eyelashes as he said it.

Here, then, is our proposition: This is God's country. The words go deeper than we think. They are weighted not only with privilege, but with responsibility; for, if indeed this is God's country, it devolves upon all good people to keep it so.

And it is God's country by a sevenfold right, to wit:

A Christian Discoverer

First: By right of discovery. Who did discover America? The Phœnicians about 400 B.C., according to Strabo, while navigating the Atlantic, found a mysterious land, which they called Atlantis. It matters not whether or no this was really America, since they sailed away without settling it. There was apparently, in divine Providence, no place for the altars of Baal and Astarte in that new country in the Western Sea.

Or was it Eric the Red who discovered America, as some historians think he did, about 1000 A.D.? The question has little or no bearing on the matter in hand; since he, also, with his hardy Norsemen, having touched at Labrador, forthwith sailed away. There was no place, apparently, in the New World for the gods of Walhalla, a kind Providence having better things in store for it.

The man who finally achieved the honor of discovering our country sailed westward through the Pillars of Hercules, in 1492, in a ship named after the virgin mother of Christ. The soil on which he landed, off the mainland, was christened San Salvador, "Land of the Saviour," and the signature affixed to the report of his discovery was Servus Salvatoris Christo ferens. Thus did America pass under the Christian name by pre-emption in the name of God.

Second: This is God's country by right of settlement. For, let it be observed, the mainland of America, after its discovery, lay practically unsettled for more than a hundred years. In this interval strange things happened. Galileo lived, and Shakespeare. Luther nailed his theses to the chapel door at Wittenberg and sent the echoes of the Reformation reverberating around the world. The Great Armada was wrecked. The bells tolled out the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. The Duke of Alva hurled the forces of the Inquisition against the dykes of Holland in vain. Ah, that was a wonderful century. God was preparing the men who were to occupy the New World!

The Little "Half Moon"

At length they came. The Half Moon sailed this way, manned by Hendrik Hudson and his crew of Dutch Protestants, all of them veterans of the long-protracted war against the Spanish Fury. They were not refugees, but ambitious pioneers, eager to better their hope of an honest livelihood and to make the most of themselves. They had established civil and ecclesiastical freedom in their own country, and were now seeking investment for their released energies in new fields of industry and enterprise. They were men of intelligence, courage and independence, born in the air of freedom and bred in the University of Human Rights.

And hither came another ship, a few years later, called the Mayflower, manned by fugitives from persecution. They were brave, honest men, not frilled and powdered, but armed mightily with the sword of the Spirit and having the purposes of freedom pulsing at the very centre of their hearts. So they came, the sifted peoples of the Old World, the stuff that heroes are made of; and they were followed by others of like calibre, such as the Huguenots of France, and Covenanters from the conventicles of old Scotland, scarred in brave struggles against oppression. God had winnowed the threshing-floors of all Europe to find this wheat for the planting of America, and he had kept the land waiting until these men should be ready to take possession of it.

Our Immigrant Millions

And still they come. The crews of the Half Moon and the Mayflower stand for the two classes of immigrants who are constantly sailing this way. On the one hand there are those who come hither to better their condition, like Jason and his men searching for the Golden Fleece; and, on the other, those who flee from persecution on the other side of the sea.

A visit to Ellis Island brings a revelation to every thoughtful man. Here is the problem that must be settled; for out of it flow the issues of our national life. What is to be done with the round million of immigrants who pass through "the pens" on Ellis Island every year? It is a mistake to think of them as the mere superflux of Europe. They stand for the best among the nations, for ambition, love of freedom, high hope and purpose to get on in the world. But can our country assimilate them? Will this inpouring tide prove to be a mere witches' broth of trouble, or a Pentecostal gathering of the world's best and noblest? That depends on what our country does with them. Is there enough of the leaven of godliness in our American civilization to leaven the lump? To leave God out of the reckoning, at this juncture, is to jeopardize our national welfare.

Third: This is God's country by right of eminent domain. The thirteen Colonies, as originally banded together for mutual defense, represented about eight hundred thousand square miles of territory; with no outlook toward the West, no seaboard on the Gulf and no commercial right in the Mississippi, the great arterial inland water-way. The first step toward expansion was in the Louisiana Purchase, which was effected by Jefferson in 1803. This gave us the Mississippi River and doubled the national area. And herein was a manifest Providence. The purchase could not have been made but for the financial stress of Napoleon. In closing the bargain he said, prophetically, "I have strengthened the power of a nation which, as a maritime rival, is destined yet to humble the pride of older nations beyond the sea."

Extending Our Dominions

In 1846 the so-called Northwestern Territory passed into our hands. The story of the Oregon trail, the encroachment of the Hudson Bay Company, and the controversy of the frontiersmen, with the watchword, "Fifty-four forty or fight!" are matters of common fame. A manifest Providence again. In all our history there is no more interesting episode than the ride of Marcus Whitman, the missionary, from Walla Walla to Santa Fé, three months over the mountains, through falling snow and wintry blasts, and on to Washington, where President Tyler was persuaded to negotiate an agreement by which our boundary was fixed at the forty-ninth parallel. In 1867 the purchase of Alaska from Russia was effected; and this also by a singular combination of providential events. At the time the wisdom of the purchase was seriously questioned; but the subsequent development of Alaskan mines and harvests has abundantly vindicated it. And then came the acquisition of our island possessions: Hawaii, Porto Rico and the Philippines. These are distinctly the bequest of humanity. God save us from the pride of conquest, but make us willing to assume any responsibility whatsoever in the interest of Christian civilization and humanity which may be imposed upon us!

Fourth: This is God's country by right of arms. The first of our great wars was waged by the thirteen Colonies against the invasion of the French; and God's part in that conflict is distinctly recognized. When Israel Putnam set out for the North, with his "Green Mountain boys," he received at the hands of Rev. George Whitefield a standard bearing the legend Nil desperandum, Christo sub duce, which sounds like a transcript of the Scriptural saying, "We can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth us!"

Our Two Great Wars

In our next great war, that of the Revolution, there was a fervent and unceasing appeal for the interposition of the Divine Arm. At Valley Forge the half-starved army, in rags and tatters, camped upon its knees, and George Washington, the commander-in-chief, knelt in the midst, devoutly commending the outcome of that conflict to the righteous God. In the throes of our Civil War, which was waged in behalf of both freedom and our national life, the homes of the people were homes of prayer, where they sang:

> Our father's God, to thee,
> Author of liberty,
> To thee we sing!

And, at the front, our soldiers, marching along the thin red line, kept time to the Battle Hymn of the Republic:

> In the beauty of the lilies, Christ was born across the sea,
> With a glory in his bosom that transfigures you and me;
> As he died to make men holy, let us die to make men free;
> His truth is marching on.

Fifth: This is God's country by right of tillage. "He hath not dealt so with any nation." We are rejoicing to-day in bountiful harvests, and unexampled prosperity. The wealth of our country is estimated at a hundred billions of dollars! It would take the lifetime of a Methusaleh to count it. To imagine it is like looking at clouds of star-dust in the heavens. It is related that when Matthew Arnold returned from his visit to America he said, "I find no fault with that country except that it is so beastly prosperous." Ours is indeed the land that flows with milk and honey. The recent panic in commercial circles was, as everybody knows, not due to any lack of money, but rather to a superabundance of it. The danger to the ship lies not in the fact that she lacks gold ballast, but that she is loaded to the gunwale with it. And every farthing of that wealth is due to the goodness of God.

The "Half Moon's" Pious Legend

In whose hands is this immeasurable wealth? We have thirty millions of Christian people who by common consent are the thrifty, cultured and prosperous class. What a trust is here and what grave responsibilities are involved in it! John Foster says, "Power to its last atom is responsibility." God has given us our broad acres and inexhaustible mines of treasure, and with them he has laid a mighty burden of duty upon us.

Sixth: This is God's country by statutory right. Our own deliberate and oft-repeated enactments have made it so. The men who came over in the Half Moon were impelled by convictions which found expression in the legend at the masthead, "For God and His Church." And in the government which they established on Manhattan Island they left no room for doubt or question as to their Christian principles. In the cabin of the Mayflower, in mid-ocean, John Carver was elected by ballot Governor of the as-yet-unborn colony; and a system of government was drawn up, beginning with the words "In the name of God," and closing with the words "In the name of God. Amen."

The Continental Congress, that met in 1776 to frame our Declaration of Independence, was opened with prayer, and the preamble of that memorable symbol of human rights was a transcript of Paul's words on Mars' Hill, "God hath made of one blood all nations of men." A like recognition of religion is found in our national Constitution. It is true that the name of God is not found in that instrument; but his authority as manifest in Holy Scriptures is interwoven through and through it. The principles which are therein set forth were avowedly based upon the Decalogue and the Sermon on the Mount; which are the two historic symbols of ethics in the world to-day.

Seventh: This is God's country by Res Adjudicata. The question has been referred once and

AUSTRALIA, TOO, HAS A REVIVAL

4,000 PEOPLE LISTENING TO DR. CHAPMAN, AT THE GREAT REVIVAL IN SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA

By E. HERMAN,

Sydney, Australia

WHEN it was announced, some months ago, that the Chapman-Alexander mission party was coming to Sydney earnest men in all the churches prophesied gloomy things. Sydney had suffered from that spurious evangelism which Dr. Chapman warns us about in these days. When the news of Boston's awakening came to our ears some took heart of grace, but others said, "Yes, it is wonderful that this mission should have shaken this stronghold of cold culture and subtle heresy; but can they shake a city so gaily indifferent, so carelessly and superficially responsive to every sensation as Sydney?"

The mission began. The meetings were crowded, and the numbers who could not get in swelled from day to day. Every previous evangelistic movement stood eclipsed. A band of ministers and laymen, chiefly members of the Evangelical Council of New South Wales, stood by the workers with loyalty and enthusiasm. Still, many leaders in Christian work stood apart, not so much in antagonism as in gloomy foreboding.

Suddenly, a great revulsion of feeling swept over these mournful prophets. One afternoon it was whispered that the impossible had happened. A unique ministers' meeting had been held, at which leading men who had hitherto stood aloof declared themselves whole-heartedly on the side of evangelism. Dr. Chapman spoke to these ministers with a brotherly sympathy and a wisdom which overcame all prejudice. The coldest heart was set on fire. The ministers rose in their seats, and those who had been coldly critical, if not explicitly antagonistic, knelt in the aisle with streaming eyes and sobbing breath, bowing in solemn reconsecration.

Ten days later, in the Town Hall, Dr. Chapman gave an address to church officers, Sunday School teachers and Christian workers. A great band of professed Christians, many of them veterans in the service of the Church, came forward to make a definite covenant of reconsecration and full surrender. The platform was packed with ministers, some of whom had not been to the ministers' meeting, and scores of these stood with the rest, and, with tears, renewed their allegiance and loyalty to Jesus. From that time the men who had stood aloof and prophesied failure began to throw themselves into the movement with generous zeal.

We have seen wonderful things in Sydney during the past weeks. We have seen the great masses trembling in the hand of God. We have seen marvelous conversions, miraculous deliverances. The meetings for men were the greatest we have ever experienced. Men of every type and class crowded to the Town Hall. The average attendance at the after-meetings was two thousand. These after-meetings were held in the basement, where there was no sitting accommodation, and the men stood, tightly packed. They came forward and accepted Christ at these meetings, not by the score, but by the hundred. The women, too, have responded with an intensity and earnestness unequaled in any previous evangelistic campaign here. One woman, who brought her sinful, broken life to Jesus one night at the Town Hall, went out of the meeting with joy in her heart, to be waylaid by one who had been her partner in sin. He commanded her to return to her former life, and when she refused he shot her.

The feature of this revival which has impressed us most deeply is not its effect upon the masses of the people, but upon the churches. We have seen the great army of converts file past, and our hearts would have sunk with fear and misgivings concerning their future if we had not known that there was a revived church waiting to receive them.

The Ministers' Meeting and Covenant Night were followed by other conferences for ministers and workers, and every day brought news of local revivals among church members. Church officers, who had been the trial and cross of their minister, became his help and inspiration. Sunday School teachers set out to win their scholars for Christ. Prominent business men stood up before the people and declared themselves on Jesus' side. The cumulative force of the movement reached its culmination on "Church Day." On that day the ministers, at Dr. Chapman's request, asked their people to meet them at their church at 9:30 A.M. The attendance amazed them, being from thirty-two to three hundred, according to the membership of the churches. The willingness of the people to sign the King's Business Covenant Cards, pledging themselves to support and co-operate with their pastor in various ways, thrilled them with new hope. The unexpected conversions at these meetings, the reconciliation of sundered friends, the final and full surrender of half-hearted Christians, made their hearts throb with overflowing joy.

The great campaign of 1909 is giving Australia a new church—a church immeasurably heightened and enriched, presenting to the world a permanent miracle, which will strike and arrest and allure the multitudes; and once again the people will marvel and come together, "not that they might see Jesus only, but Lazarus also, whom he has raised from the dead."

GOD'S COUNTRY

again to our Supreme Court and always with the same result. On three several occasions it has been decided that ours is a Christian land and that its laws and jurisprudence are based upon the Word of God.

It would appear that this should determine the matter beyond all dispute. To challenge the Christian character of our country and its government, under such circumstances, is possible only for two classes of people: On the one hand, for disloyal natives, who decline to recognize the final arbitrament of our courts; and, on the other, for unnaturalized immigrants who seek to apply the political heresies of foreign countries to the institutions of our national life. All true Americans doff their bonnets at the decree of law: Vox populi, vox Dei. They recognize the final authority of King People, and of "the powers that be," which are "ordained of God."

A French artist, some years ago, conceived the thought of a colossal statue of Liberty Enlightening the World. In due time his dream was realized; and the question arose, Where should the statue be placed? On the banks of his own Seine, in sight of the July Column, the Dome of the Invalides and the bloody memorials of the Place de la Concorde? No, not there! On one of the lofty peaks of Germany, close by the mailed figure that keeps die Wacht am Rhein, under the shadow of baronial ruins and countless monuments of ruthless war? No, not there! By the shore of the Bosphorus, within hearing of the atrocities of the unspeakable Turk and the resounding knout of the Czar? No, not there! By London Bridge, neighbor to the Tower, the graves of Tudors and Plantagenets and the martyr pyres of Smithfield? No, not there! Where then? At the portals of the Western World. And there you may see it—Liberty uplifting her lighted torch. Nay, not Liberty, but the Evangel! With one hand she lifts the veil of slumber from her eyes and with the other upholds the Cross, from which radiates a brighter light than ever shone on land or sea. Liberty enlightening the world? Nay, the Evangel imparting that liberty with which the truth makes free!

For all the blessings which are involved in such considerations as these we return our fervent gratitude. Ah, this is God's country! And all the more splendidly shall we make it so by imparting its blessings to others of the children of men. The well by the gate of Bethlehem flows sweeter for the fact that Jesse's neighbors draw from it. Gladstone wrote: "You have in America a natural basis for the greatest continuous empire that ever was instituted by men." But that is not to the point. Continuous empire is little or nothing of itself. What we want is to make our national life a blessing to all. This is the mission of America to the world. God help us to discharge it!

KING ALFONSO GREETS THE ESPERANTISTS

M. Edmond Privat Tells the Story of the Work of the Barcelona Congress

Lazar Ludovic Zamenhof

SIXTEEN hundred delegates of the Esperanto societies of twenty-two different countries attended the Fifth Universal Congress of Esperanto at Barcelona, in Spain. It was a splendid success, in spite of the very unfavorable conditions created by the recent revolution in Barcelona. Many Esperantists were compelled to stay home because of their families, who were afraid of the idea of their going to such an unquiet city.

However, one forgets easily under the Spanish sun! We saw nothing that could make any one think there had been a revolution here. I had to pay a coachman to bring me to some hidden square, where I could see a convent with a blackened wall and broken windows. On the great boulevard "Rambla," roses and chrysanthemums are sold as freely as ever. At night, under the sparkling light of electric lamps, the joyful crowd in black shawls, white dresses and pretty fans shining like butterflies walks as usual. It seems as if people never slept here, for until 3 o'clock A.M. the Rambla is as crowded and living as Fifth Avenue in New York at 5 P.M. On the boulevards, on the small streets, everywhere, one hears the sound of the beautiful Catalan tongue. For Barcelona is the chief city of Catalonia, and the Catalans love their own language before everything else. They are now fighting against the increasing invasion of the Spanish tongue in their great city. This may explain why they understood so well the importance of an auxiliary neutral language for intercourse between the nations. They gave to the Esperantists the heartiest and warmest welcome.

The green Esperanto flag, with its star, waves on all the pavilions on the Rambla and on many balconies all over the big city. All day and all night, on the streets, violins and guitars play Zamenhof's hymn, "La Espero." Tramway conductors, policemen, little merchants who sell stamps, postcards and fans until 4 A.M., all of them keep in their pockets small Esperanto textbooks, which have taught them enough to please the delegates and get their sympathy with their custom.

Everywhere are sold daily papers, weekly reviews, postcards, photos, etc., with the picture of the creator of Esperanto, Dr. Zamenhof, who has come to Barcelona all the way from his home in Warsaw, in spite of his very delicate health. Enthusiastic ovations greeted him at the opening meeting in the "Palacio de Bellas Artes," and showed him once more how every one is thankful for his great gift to humanity, and also how dearly every one loves him.

The Mayor of Barcelona, the city council and the Catalan deputation to the Parliament of Spain attended several meetings of the Congress. The Mayor, speaking in Esperanto, presided at the magnificent festival of the "Flower Games," in which prizes were given for the best original poems in Esperanto on "Love," "Faith," "Humanity," etc. Soldiers of the National Guard, in uniform, were standing around the hall, and the crowd arose in enthusiasm when the trumpets announced that the German Esperanto poetess, Marie Hankel, had been proclaimed "Queen of the Festival," and she came and sat on the throne at the "Flower Games."

King Alfonso XIII. sent a telegram of greeting to the Congress, congratulating Dr. Zamenhof and accepting the post of Honorary Chairman. To a telegram of thanks from the Congress he replied by a second message, full of encouragement and wishes for the success of Esperanto in all countries. The Cabinet, as a whole, and several of the ministers individually, sent telegrams of congratulation and encouragement for the Esperantists. The governments of the United States, Belgium and Norway have sent to the Congress official representatives.

All the week, there were meetings for discussing methods of propaganda and questions of international organization, and it was a wonderful thing to hear Spaniards, Frenchmen, Americans, Germans, Russians and Scandinavians taking part in the debate and replying to each other's arguments, all speaking with eloquence and fluency in the new internatonal language.

Since 1905 Esperanto has established an international academy for collecting all the new words used by good authors, choosing from among them the best and most useful ones, with the view of publishing yearly a list with exact definitions and corresponding translations in the chief national languages. With such methods, Esperanto is making great progress, and Dr. Zamenhof expressed his satisfaction on this point at the Barcelona Congress. Esperanto holds within itself a noble and generous sentiment of universal brotherhood. Dr. Zamenhof calls this "La interna ideo de Esperantismo." Esperantists are confident of the ultimate triumph of their language. It is being introduced slowly into the public schools in some countries of Europe and the Western Hemisphere. Esperanto Consuls, as aids to commerce and for travelers and as helps to young students, have been appointed in more than a thousand cities by the Universal Esperanto Association. Teachers of many countries have come to Barcelona to pass the examinations for the diploma of the International Institute of Esperanto. Everywhere the movement is getting stronger, and it is always better and better organized. In Geneva, last month, Esperanto was used as the official language at the International Congress of Psychology. The same thing happened this month in Budapest, at the International Congress of Medicine, more than half of the members of which were Esperantist doctors. The American government was represented there by Major Straub, who had a special mission to recommend the adoption of Esperanto by the International Red Cross sanitary service. We have decided to accept America's invitation for the Sixth Congress, to be held next year, 1910, very likely in the city of Washington, D. C. The Seventh will be at Antwerp, Belguim, in 1911.

I wish to thank the American Esperantists for their kind invitation. Let us hope that the sixth Congress may have the greatest success. I have no doubt we shall be splendidly received in the United States and I sincerely hope that an arrangement will be made to bring over to the United States on a special steamer a number of European Esperantists, representing many different nations, who will be ready to demonstrate to the world that men of all countries, while loving the language of their fatherland, can also love Esperanto for the sake of humanity.

EDMOND PRIVAT.

A READER ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE

By KATE UPSON CLARK

I WOULD like, through the columns of your esteemed paper, to express my views of woman suffrage. I have heard many persons argue that our women should have as many rights and privileges as men, and so they should as far as that argument goes; but when you place our women in a position to vote it is not a privilege, in one sense of the word—it is a punishment. When they give one woman the right to vote, that right is also extended to all classes. Can we suppose for a moment that a respectable lady would go to the polls on election day and mingle with all classes for the privilege of casting her ballot? Most assuredly she would not! Then the class of women with whom the true lady would not wish to mingle would have the polls to themselves. Are they capable of handling a ballot? Would their judgment be a fair judgment? The ballot was never meant for women, and women in politics lower themselves in the eyes of men. Our women were intended to brighten home life and make it attractive, and not to travel the country, making political speeches. If the men, who are trained for casting the ballot intelligently, make mistakes sometimes in their choice, what would our women do, who know nothing whatever about it?

It is my hope that Maryland, at least, will not grant woman suffrage.

Centreville, Md. C. P. ARMSTRONG.

Your views upon equal suffrage are shared by many good people. but have you considered all the points involved? Here are some of them:

Women are taxed and punished under the laws, yet they have no voice in the making of such laws. The same principle caused the American Revolution. It is said by critical Europeans that "government by the people," as practised here, is a failure; but the world will not see government by the people until all vote. Only half vote now.

We wish our women to make their homes pure and peaceful; yet the purity and peace of their homes are menaced constantly by outside gambling halls, saloons and other haunts of vice, which lure their husbands and sons into sin, and over which women have no control. The ballot would give some control over these conditions.

You say that women will go up and down making political speeches. Few men go forth to make such speeches. It seems likely that still fewer women will do so.

Schools and all institutions for the care of the young, the erring, and the feeble, are usually better cared for by women than men. The vote will help women to do more in this direction. The working-girls particularly need the protection of the vote.

The church contains far more women than men. The prisons contain far more men than women. These facts indicate a virtuous and law-abiding temper on the part of women. Such a temper is needed in our politics.

Evil women generally do not care to vote. They like to conceal their addresses, and move often from place to place. Where they do vote, it is thought by competent judges that they are rather more likely to vote for good causes than is the similar class of men, which enormously outnumbers them. As all of us in the street and on cars probably jostle such men and women daily, the contact will not hurt us at the polls.

The same arguments which are now used against equal suffrage were used fifty years ago against the higher education for women, but they are seldom so used now. As women have risen up to their educational opportunities, so they will rise up to all new ones. The responsibility of the ballot is no light one, but women are needed in our politics, and they will gladly lend a helping hand. Freedom and justice, as you intimate in your letter, demand that they have equal rights with men. Do not oppose the movement, for women are the great promoters of God's work in the world.

The Great Celebration Over

FOR two weeks the city and State of New York have played the role of hospitable host to the rest of the country, and to hundreds who owe allegiance to other flags than our own. The great metropolis gave itself up to parades and merrymaking in a way that has had no parallel in our history, and the numerous branches of the committee who planned the celebration and arranged the many unique features which gave so much pleasure to millions may now take a much needed rest, with the feeling that their work was well done and the results brilliant beyond their most sanguine expectations. Two million people at least witnessed the historical pageant, a parade which set a new standard for commemorative parades in which floats and tableaux are used. A little less than ten millions of people in the aggregate saw the parades, counting those who attended all of them.

There was nothing cheap and tawdry about the wonderful historical floats. Each was the conception of an artist, the result of careful study, and plenty of money to properly execute the design. Never has history been taught in such attractive form. Not only did hundreds of thousands of native born Americans get a concrete idea of events they but dimly remembered from the days when they read their school histories, but the foreigners who flocked to see became deeply interested in the great events which have occurred in the country they have made their home. The educational value of the pageant and parades was incalculable; it refreshed the patriotism of Americans and kindled a love and pride in the flag in the hearts of the foreign born. No one could witness the stirring events, from the naval parade on the first day through to the end of the celebration, without a feeling of gratitude that he belonged to the country, and the country which could do such great things belonged to him.

Now New York has gone back to work, the lights which for nights made it fairyland have ceased to twinkle, but many of its guests have lingered on, fascinated by the wonderful city which has so many attractions, so many interesting things to see. The spell of the Hudson celebration still seems to be on visitors and New Yorkers alike; it was such a magnificent success that they saw it close with regret, and reluctantly turned again to work in this great hive of humanity.

The Polar Discussion Goes On

MR. WHITNEY, the mutual friend of explorers Cook and Peary, has returned from the Arctic. His home-coming, however, has by no means settled the polar controversy. He states that he was told by Cook that the latter had reached the Pole, but he was pledged to secrecy for reasons not yet apparent. Obedient to his pledge, when he met Peary, he simply told him that Cook had passed his "farthest north" record of 87 degrees 6 minutes. He confirms Dr. Cook's statement that Commander Peary refused to permit the former's belongings to be placed on board the Roosevelt at Etah for the return home, and added that, ten years ago, Peary had followed the same course in declining to bring back the instruments and records of the explorer Sverdrup from Smith's Sound.

Commander Peary has made an important contribution to the discussion, in outlining the evidence by which he expects to prove his assertion that Dr. Cook did not reach the Pole. He charges, among other matters, that the doctor used an artificial horizon of glass, which would have been useless for taking observations at the Pole, as mercury freezes at 35 degrees minus, and Dr. Cook reported a temperature as low as 87 degrees. Explorer A. W. Greely, however, pronounces this objection unimportant, and says he himself has used a glass horizon satisfactorily in polar work. The commander's main charge, however, deals with the distance—nearly seventeen hundred miles—traveled by Dr. Cook in a single sledge journey, which he terms incredible, being nearly double the distance of the best previous record.

Such is the present status of the controversy. To prolong it by published attack and counter attack is a waste of time. Both explorers are preparing to place their complete records in the hands of competent judges, and the public will be thankful to have the case decided by a jury of scientists. It is a wrangle which discredits American exploration and places us in a most unenviable light before the scientists of the world.

First Fruits of a Righteous Act

WHEN the United States, in accordance with sentiments of honesty and integrity, returned to the exchequer of China a large sum of money, which China had paid into our treasury as indemnity for our losses during the Boxer outrages in 1900, there were those who criticised the act as unwise. They thought and said that no amount of money could be too much for China to pay when the misery inflicted by her barbarian outbreak was duly remembered. But our government took its high stand on the plane of absolute justice, and retained only the amount sufficient for the reimbursement of every one concerned in that time of devastation and destruction.

The Chinese were astonished at our magnanimity. Their eyes were opened as they could have been in no other way, and they saw the ideals which govern and influence a Christian people. Now comes the story of the first fruits of that righteous act. China, for centuries the most conservative empire on the globe, to-day marches in the van with the most progressive nations, and from day to day strides forward into the full glow of modern civilization. She is using the money returned to her by America for the education of Chinese boys on American soil. The Chinese government has already established excellent preparatory schools on European and American models in her great cities, and here students are so taught that they may enter American colleges and universities. The first forty selected lads from these schools are now on their way to us. They will be speedily followed by fifty more, and we are told that the number to be sent in a twelvemonth will reach four hundred. This means for China the true dawn of a new day.

Under the Gospel Searchlight

IT would seem that the discussion on Dr. Eliot's "New Theology" has awakened in some ministerial breasts a desire to get into the limelight. A few preachers in our leading cities, belonging to the class who deliver brilliant essays on Sunday forenoons, have discovered philosophical beauties in the address of the New England professor, and pay high compliments to his utterances. These eulogiums, however, can convey but little satisfaction to their object, since they are all more or less of the same type as that delivered lately by a New York clergyman, who, after praising the address fulsomely, said frankly: "No living being can expound the religion of the present, much less the religion yet to be," and added, "there are tremendous gaps, or omissions, that can be remedied only by the recognition of a personal Christ. The whole lecture falls flat in relation to a personal Christ and immortality." This from the good old doctor's kindest critics—indeed, we might say from his friends—is the sort of commendation that kills. The truth is that the "New Theology" is a purely negative product, interest in which is already dead. It is a philosophic antique, which comes two thousand years too late; and it possesses no vital interest for people who live in a Christian dispensation and in the full light of revelation and spiritual experience.

The Basis of Usefulness

TO one who marks the great world movements there come, from time to time, interesting surprises. Around the whole world, like a kindling flame, may run a single thought, as it were; and such a thought is generally for nobler and higher living.

Not many years ago, this would have been impossible. We have an expression, "the idea is in the air"; because it has sometimes seemed as though the same thought occurred in widely separated communities at almost the same hour. But even this fact would not have been generally known before the days of telegraphs and telephones. Also, upon investigation, it would probably appear that there was some sort of communication from which the movement was spread.

Whether "in the air," or arising from logical causes, it is certain that there was never in the world's history so universal and intelligent a pursuit of health as at present.

The wonderful temperance revival throughout our land is very largely based upon this idea. Liquor makes men less efficient, injures digestion, shortens life. This is a cardinal point in the addresses of the temperance agitators.

A nation of sickly and degenerate men and women is bound to fail. In this view it becomes a patriotic duty for every one of us to maintain a high degree of health. The sane mind follows in the wake of the sane body. Common sense and spirituality become almost impossible to him who has continually to think of mending and repairing a weak or pain-racked frame.

Our Saviour looked after the health of the people. Everywhere he was healing and restoring. He showed us in nearly every miracle the high value that he placed upon health.

How is it to be won? Regular, honest, hard work; plain food; plenty of sleep, and as much outdoor air as possible. Add to these the poet's rule, and this great boon—the greatest of earthly blessings—will be yours. He said:

> Live pure, speak true, right wrong and follow the King.
> Else, wherefore born?

GENERAL NOTES

—ANOTHER NOTABLE illustration of the "staying power" of revival ministry is found in the great awakening in Wales, which took place six years ago. Statistics lately collected show that in four religious denominations there has been a net permanent gain of 67,400 members and communicants as the direct result of that revival. This will be largely increased by the final returns from other denominations. It is surely a sufficient answer to those critics who inquire, "Do revivals really revive?"

—IN A RECENT speech at Seattle, President Taft made what is regarded as an outspoken declaration in favor of ship subsidy legislation at the next Congress. He said: "We earn a profit from our foreign mails from $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 a year. The application of that amount would be quite sufficient to put on a satisfactory basis two or three Oriental lines and several lines from the East to South America." The completion of the Panama Canal, on January 1, 1915, will change the avenues of international trade and give our country its opportunity for developing our merchant marine, which we should not fail to improve.

—AN AGE OF mighty conquests! Conquest of the air, the sea, the Pole. Conquests of science in plenty. Conquests for the Gospel in China, where the barriers are breaking down; in Korea, where thousands are being brought in by the power of the Holy Spirit; in Australia, where the greatest revival ever known at the Antipodes is still going on, and conquest of the unchurched and indifferent at home, where over 12,000,000 souls have been added to America's Christian Church membership in ten years. These are facts that leave no room for discouragement. The world is moving ahead and in the right direction.

—THE BELLS OF the 444 churches of St. Louis, Mo., ushered in at sunrise October 3 a seven days' celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the city's incorporation. The day was known as "Church Day." Commemorative ceremonies were held in nearly all of the city churches. There was a song service in the afternoon at the new Coliseum, in which 10,000 Protestant Sunday School children participated. Religious and historical organizations invaded the downtown districts, and tablets marking the sites of famous old structures were unveiled. Among the features of the week were aerial contests, pageants on land, and a magnificent parade on the Mississippi River, in which a torpedo-boat fleet of the Navy participated. More than 1,000 Mayors of cities were invited to attend the celebration.

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

Conducted by FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

To London by Fishguard

NEW York has been brought within five days of London by the short cut through Fishguard, a Welsh port. The other week, for the first time, the Mauretania called at Fishguard on her homeward voyage, and landed her passengers for London and the continent, a saving of five hours being effected by the adoption of the new route. The Cunarder broke all records on her voyage, crossing the Atlantic to Queenstown, 2,807 miles, in four days, fourteen hours and twenty-seven minutes. She reached Queenstown at 7:27 A.M. and arrived at Fishguard at 1:18 P.M., her passengers leaving little less than an hour later and arriving in London at 6:40. The actual time from New York to London was five days, one hour and forty minutes. The population of Fishguard gave the Mauretania a warm reception, with flags waving from every house and governmental artillery firing a salute. A beautiful feature of the welcome was ten pretty Welsh maidens, clad in national costume, giving sprigs of heather to the passengers as they landed from the ship. An old Welshman, who had lived forty-three years in America, was the first man to pass from the ship to the dock. Breaking of records is the order of the day; we are in a racing age. The shortest paths from one point to another are sought on the land for the railway cars, and on the ocean for the greyhounds of the sea. Landing at Fishguard makes a saving of ninety-two miles in the sea voyage, though the distance from Liverpool to London is fifty-nine miles shorter than it is from Fishguard to London; but there is a decided saving in time by going by Fishguard. Twenty millions of dollars were spent by the Great Western Railway in the construction of the new landing place in Wales. It is very likely that Montauk Point will be selected by ocean liners for New York as the first stop on this side. It will be well if, in our moral progress and spiritual undertakings, we shall be as strenuous and enterprising as are the record-breakers in the business world. The swift movement of a ship is used in the book of Job to illustrate the rapidity with which time flies.

My days are swifter than a post. They are passed away as the swift ships. (Job 9 : 25-26.)

Poverty and Success

Some writer has taken a thousand successful men and traced their origin. He found that three hundred started as farmers' sons, two hundred began as messenger boys, two hundred sold newspapers on the streets, one hundred were apprentices to printers, one hundred were apprenticed in manufactories, fifty began at the bottom of the ladder in railroading, and only fifty of the thousand had wealthy parents to start them out on the roadway of life with any capital. These thousand men selected were not all men who had gotten rich, but men who had succeeded in the various professions and occupations which they had chosen. The fact disclosed by the thousand selected would be verified if a million were to be chosen; the fact is that the necessity of labor is one of the best assets that a young man can have in starting out to achieve success in life. Wealth so often breeds indolence, while poverty encourages industry.

The soul of the sluggard desireth and hath nothing: but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat. (Prov. 13 : 4.)

End of World Postponed

Every now and then there are fanatics, who pretend to have interpreted prophecy and predict the date when the world shall come to an end; but time has gone right on paying no attention to them and left them to the ridicule of their fellows. Ten o'clock, September 24, was the day absolutely set by members of the Latter Reign of the Apostolic Church, who call themselves "Triune Immersionists." Three hundred members of this sect gathered in a village in Massachusetts to witness the coming of Christ and the end of time. While the rain fell in torrents, an omen of the coming crash, the elect passed the night in their chapel at Ashdod, on the main turnpike between Boston and Plymouth, singing hymns and praying in a semi-hysterical fashion. During the night a child affected by the excitement talked incoherently; a sister who claims the gift of tongues, shouting, "Out of the mouth of babes," pretended to translate the little one's mutterings as a verification that the world would end at ten o'clock; then a sea of fire would cleanse and purify the sinners, who include every one but the subjects of the Latter Reign of the Apostolic Church. As the appointed hour drew nigh the Immersionists sang and prayed more lustily than ever, if possible. A little before ten o'clock the sky grew ominously black, and the worshipers were assured that the judgment day was being ushered in. Ten o'clock came, the clouds passed away, the sun shone brightly and the millennium was postponed.

George Ullhekson, a baker of Watertown, Mass., crazed with excitement caused by the expectation of his Lord's coming, committed suicide. Some of the colored people in Atlanta, Ga., assembled to witness the day of judgment. But it is not here yet, and no mortal knows, or will know, when it shall be, for that is a secret which the divine Father cherishes in his own bosom. We are more interested in occupying the time than in acquainting ourselves with its end. There is a day of judgment, one for which all other days were made, an event toward which all other events have flown. It is a court whose judgments will never be reversed. The Saviour, who is to be the Judge, expressly states that the time of his coming has been withheld from the knowledge of men.

But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only. (Matt. 24 : 36.)

Salutes Flag of Peace

As the naval parade in the Hudson-Fulton celebration started up the river Miss Josephine Wood and Master Robert McAdoo, on the top of the Terminal Building, raised the first Peace Flag which ever floated over New York City. From one section of the building the international peace emblem, snowy white, with a stripe of rainbow hues and inscription "Pax," was unfurled, while from the other end of the edifice the flag of the National League of Peace, the American banner with a band of white, floated. When the Gloucester passed the Flag of Peace she fired a salute of twenty-one guns, this tribute being answered by twenty-one bombs from the roof of the building. At the ceremonies of the unfurling of the Peace Flag several addresses were made, including one by Mr. William G. McAdoo, who among other things said: "War and ill-will are synonymous terms; peace obtained by might has no permanent basis; peace begotten of good-will and the love of humanity is the only kind that will endure. All of the destructive power of the mighty fleet of battleships assembled here to-day would be rendered instantly and forever impotent if even a few of the most powerful nations would accept and apply the divine doctrine of peace." Mr. McAdoo practises as well as preaches the arts of peace in building tunnels under great rivers, and in promoting the highest kind of industrial success. Even before the Saviour's advent into the world the prophet foretold his message of peace:

To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace. (Luke 1 : 79.)

Gunda the Bad Elephant

Gunda, the elephant of the Bronx Zoo and one of the finest male elephants in captivity, came near killing his keeper, Walter Thuman, the other day. Only a few years ago children used to ride on Gunda's back about the park, but his ill-temper brought an end to this practice. He took a dislike to one keeper after another in turn, including his present assistant keeper. He has heretofore loved Thuman very much, and hence there was some surprise when he acted so badly toward him. Thuman was spreading straw about the enclosure outside the cage when he heard Gunda behind him give a snort. The man saw that his little eyes were angry and that his trunk was lifted on high. As the keeper jumped and ran the animal's trunk swept with terrific force over the place where he had stood. Thuman ran for the back of the corral, toward the entrance to the indoor cage, Gunda charging after him. The keeper knew that once inside he was a dead man, and dodging in time started the other way. He ran for his life, the animal's trunk almost touching him, and dived under the lowest bar of the corral and rolled out of danger. Gunda jumped up in the air, hoping to bring his heavy feet down on the body of the man, and failed, but shook the earth around him. In his attempts to get at the man the elephant snapped off clean six inches of one of his tusks. The keeper instantly got his elephant whip and long goad, with its six-inch point, and entering the cage advanced on Gunda. The elephant stood swaying his great body, swinging his trunk and watching the man. Thuman slashed him about the head with the whip, struck him with his goad, compelled him to lie down in humiliation and penitence, mounted his head and rode about the corral a victor. Gunda's meanness made a good setting for his keeper's strength of will and courage, illustrating man's domination over all earthly life. There is a good deal of the bad elephant in the human species. Malice is so easily stirred and is so bitter and relentless at so little provocation. Hatred, the good Book says, has in it the seeds of murder.

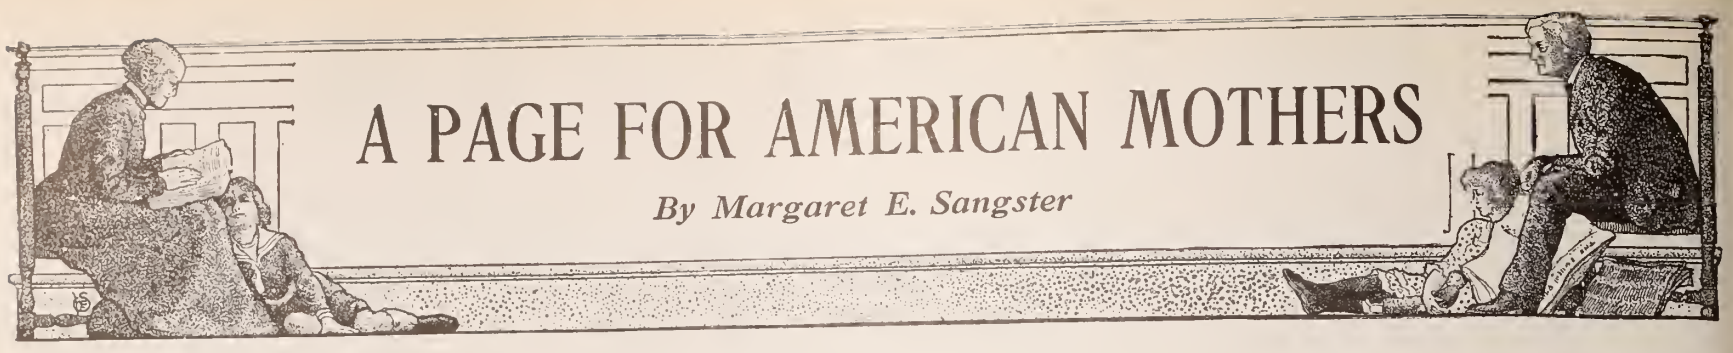
Alive Without a Stomach

W. B. Smith, of Brooklyn, was dying by inches from a cancer in his stomach. He was sent to the Bushwick Avenue Hospital, where, to save the patient from death, they undertook the heroic surgery of removing his whole stomach. That he is living, that he has gained ten pounds in weight and bids fair to have pretty good general health is the marvel of the medical profession and the general public. The surgeon fastened the esophagus to the intestines, as a plumber would join two pieces of pipe, and says that the man has before him the promise of a reasonably long life. Whether this shall be the case or not, that he lives at all is a tribute to the advanced surgical skill of our time. Christ the great physician is responsible for most of the improvements in all branches of science and of art. His civilization has among its expressions the most marvelous progress in the science of medicine and of surgery. His teachings and spirit are conducive to health, and his will cures completely every malady and every ill that may afflict the soul.

And he put forth his hand and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately the leprosy departed from him. (Luke 5 : 13.)



A PAGE FOR AMERICAN MOTHERS

By Margaret E. Sangster

Saving Steps

ABOUT this time the days grow perceptibly shorter. Twilight gathers earlier than a month ago, and the children's afternoon playtime is somewhat abridged. A busy mother, one of those matrons who spends herself without stint in the care of her household, sat down a little reluctantly in the gathering dusk and folded her hands in her lap. She had a feeling in the back of her mind that she was doing wrong if she ever paused an instant in the onward rush of her work, from the time she rose in the morning until she went to bed at night. Gertrude and Jimmy, her eight-year-old twins, came noisily into the house, shutting the door with a bang. Jimmy threw his cap into a corner and went whistling upstairs, and Gertrude's red coat, that looked so pretty as a setting to the child's dark curls and glowing cheeks, went into a heap on the floor, and she, too, hurried upstairs, following her brother and eagerly calling to him to wait for her. The mother rose wearily, picked up Jimmy's cap and Gertrude's coat and put each in its own place. Then she sat down again, folding her hands.

"I wonder why you did that?" said Cousin Phœbe, who was staying for the month as a guest. She had so often heard the remarks concerning old maids' children that hitherto she had refrained from commenting on this mother's habit of waiting on hers hand and foot. But as it happened, this whole day she had been a witness to proceedings that tried her patience. For example, she had noticed that Mrs. Eames went up and down stairs a half dozen times in the morning, when, by a little forethought, she might have gone only once. She had observed that every one, from the maid in the kitchen to the good man of the house, interrupted her cousin by inquiries as to lost or mislaid articles, while nothing could be begun or completed without a touch or a word from her.

"What do you mean, Phœbe?" the mother said, in reply to the question, "Why did you do that?"

"Just this, my dear. Jimmy invariably throws his things wherever he pleases. When he is going to school there is a hunt, on the part of everybody, to find his books. Half the time, on a rainy day, Gertrude has not an idea where she keeps her overshoes. You drop your task, whatever it is, in order to make life easy for your boy and girl, quite forgetful of the fact that your indulgence will make it wofully hard for them by and by. My advice is, if you will let me give it, that you should begin to save steps for yourself. Begin to-night. Let the rest wait on you. To-morrow morning, before you leave your own room, plan your day to the end that you may not have to trot back and forth six or eight times between breakfast and dinner. As for Robert, let that good husband of yours take a few extra steps himself while you sit still. It's no wonder you are so often tired. You have forgotten how to relax."

The mistake made by Mrs. Eames is so common that it seldom excites criticism. The busy housemother has so much to do in the ordinary course of affairs that she fancies it impossible to omit a single item, while she hardly supposes it worth her while to try oiling the household machinery for her own advantage. There are mothers who have learned, in the ordering of large families, that many steps are saved if each individual in the home who is beyond babyhood is made responsible for the care of his or her own belongings, and if each child has a definite part in the work of the house. This share may be small, but faithfulness in attending to its obligation on the part of each would contribute to the comfort of all and especially to the comfort of the mother. See whether there be not a difference in the amount of fatigue at night when you have really taken care to save steps. There is such a thing as being too tired for restful sleep. Many a woman lies down at night with an aching head and weary limbs and back, and rises in the morning little refreshed, although it is within her power to limit her work and lessen her fatigue by doing nothing herself that ought really to be done by others.

How to Make a Bed

Healthful sleep is much more likely to be our portion if we rest in a well-made bed than if the couch be lumpy and the clothing thrown upon it carelessly. In the first place, a bed should be thoroughly aired in the morning. Sun and air are as necessary to the room in which one has slept as perfect ventilation at night. The under sheet should be well tucked in at the top of the bed; the upper sheet should always be long enough to allow for a deep folding under the mattress at the bottom. Nothing is more irritating than to have an upper sheet part company with the bed, leaving the feet exposed. A thick blanket, and a counterpane over the upper sheet, should be smooth and without a wrinkle. An extra duvet, or quilt, should either be folded across the foot of the bed, in case of need, or be at hand in a closet. Pillows should not be too large, nor should pillowcases fit them too tightly.

MOTHER AND LADDIE

Madonna, in cabin or palace,
Or under the greenwood tree,
She is tasting Life's sweetest chalice,
And the angels smile as they see
The look on her face.

Rewards and Punishments

THE mother of six children was talking seriously with the mother of one. As is usual with young mothers the latter was most vigilant in repressing any inclination to wrongdoing on the part of her little one. She was afraid to pass over a fault and was solicitous to ascertain how she ought to punish any indiscretion of the baby culprit. The older woman, smiling, said, "I am afraid we all go through this phase in bringing up our children. Baby No. 1 is more strictly looked after and more frequently punished for misbehavior than are his little successors. No. 2 and No. 3 are not so often spanked as was No. 1, and by the time No. 7 arrives there is a good deal of indulgence. If I had my children to bring up again I should punish less and reward more. Praise is an incentive to right doing, while blame lays a heavy burden on a little heart. Children are in a new world, and they make mistakes just as their elders do. If God were not lenient with us for our transgressions how much greater would our sufferings be?

I always advise mothers who are beginning the moulding of the little beings committed to their care to remember, first, that it is almost always possible to avoid an issue. Do not utter a command in such a manner that opposition to it will be aroused. I have no patience with mothers who spend hour after hour in the effort to break the will of a naughty child. The will should be trained, but never broken. Another thing to remember is that, whether we know it or not, we are always setting examples that the children imitate. Love your little one, and don't worry too much about her.

Grace at the Table

Since God gives us our daily bread it is fitting that we should not sit down at the home table without returning thanks to him for his bounty. If parents have not been in the habit of asking a blessing on the food provided, they are often timid and self-conscious about undertaking the duty, although it is very simple. A man who, late in life, was converted, after becoming a professing Christian felt that he ought to say grace at the table. He did so, but it was in an indistinct and inaudible murmur that was almost amusing. If one cannot say grace clearly and distinctly, a better plan is to bow the head and have all around the table do the same, offering thus a silent prayer. Any child at the board should be able to return thanks to God if called upon to do so. In many homes, the youngest child folds little hands, bows the head and repeats the words that carry thanksgiving to the heavenly Father.

Among familiar forms none is better than "Bless, O Lord, we beseech thee, this food to our use, and us to thy service, for Christ's sake. Amen." Another equally appropriate is, "For what we are about to receive may the Lord make us truly thankful." At the table of a devout householder a child repeated the following old-fashioned grace in the hearing of the writer; but it is not altogether commendable: "Some have meat and cannot eat; some can eat and have no meat; we have meat, and we can eat. May the Lord be praised." In a New England school, scholars are accustomed to stand and sing the Doxology, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," before taking their seats at a meal. Whatever the form, let its usage become a habit.

—Who Should Lead? "My husband precedes me up the aisle of our pew, and stands aside for me to enter. My daughter says that I ought to lead, and he should follow. What is the fashion at present?" Your daughter is right about it, but if I were you I would do as I had been in the habit of doing. You probably prefer the custom to which you are used.

MIDNIGHT CALLERS

"DID you see the new specimen?" asked Dr. McKenzie from his dressing-room, where the water had been spluttering in lively fashion.

"No, she was busy with him when I got there, and I did not interrupt. David says he drank enough strong coffee to intoxicate a sober man. Doctor, I have taken the liberty of writing a card to mother, to go down with your mail. I have something to do for Williams this evening, and shall not get out home; mother expects me, and I should like her to know as early as possible."

"All right," said the Doctor. "I'll hand it to the right postman as I pass this morning. How is Williams?"

"Gaining, but very slowly. Can't talk yet, except in monosyllables."

"Well, when I'm needed you know where I am."

This was Dr. McKenzie's version of "Is there something that I can do?"

"Yes, sir," said the young man heartily, as though it was a thing that it was good to know.

PART II

IT WAS still early, and the uptown portion of the sleepy city had not yet bestirred itself when Dr. McKenzie entered the office of the Emergency Mission. The streets in this part of the town were already alive.

"Good morning," he said to the man behind the desk, speaking with the air of one who was well acquainted. "You have a guest here somewhere that I have come to call on."

"Yes, sir; No. 10 I suppose? That's the man Miss Holland sent in soon after midnight. We were to hold him until we heard from her or you. He hasn't shown any signs of wanting to get away; there has been no sound from his room, so far. He was pretty well done for last night; the boys helped him with a hot bath, and they said he was as weak as a baby. He wasn't intoxicated, perfectly sober; but he had been on a terrible debauch, evidently.

"No, sir, he's well dressed, or used to be, at least. The boys brushed and cleaned his clothes and they say they are of excellent quality and well made, but have been terribly abused.

"No, we haven't been in; but Dennis has been on the watch outside for an hour or so, and reports everything quiet. I shouldn't wonder if the man was going to be sick; he looked unusually bad, someway. We did the best we could for him last night. John Edson said Miss Holland's directions were very particular."

At that moment a bell-boy put his head in at the door and spoke to the man at the desk.

"No. 10 is moving about his room, sir."

"All right, Timmy. Will you go up, Doctor, or wait? We haven't sent in his clothes yet."

"Send them in," said Dr. McKenzie; "I'll wait five minutes and then go up."

The moment that he opened the door of No. 10, he knew that he had not come any too soon.

A more utterly forlorn and woebegone specimen of humanity than sat half dressed on the side of the clean and in every way decent and comfortable bed, even the doctor had never seen, and he was used to all sorts and conditions of men.

The very decency of the man's surroundings and the richness of his clothing seemed to accentuate the look of misery. He did not raise his eyes at his visitor's entrance, nor attempt to speak. His face expressed a despair too deep for words; a despair that was not only without a ray of hope, but had gone beyond the power to wish for any. Evidently he was in the worst stage of reaction from his recent dissipation.

"Good morning, brother," said Dr. McKenzie in a clear, cheerful voice, and he crossed the room briskly, helped himself to a chair and sat down in front of the man.

"You have had a night's rest, and don't feel very well in consequence; is that it?"

There was no response.

"'Good morning,' said Dr. McKenzie, cheerfully"

"It is a fine morning," said the doctor, feeling his way carefully. "The air has a tang in it that reminds me of home; the way-back home where I spent my boyhood. I'm four thousand miles from it now, but one never gets entirely away from home, you know."

"I wish I could!" The intensity of feeling and of fierceness in this exclamation must be imagined; words would not describe it.

"You can't," said the doctor, watching him closely. "There is no use in trying; memory is the part of us that never dies, either in this world or the other."

The groan that seemed to be wrung from the man's soul against his will, revealed such depths of misery that Dr. McKenzie had hard work to make his voice sound cheerful, as he said briskly: "So it becomes us to see to it that the memories are satisfactory."

"Curious thing, this memory," he continued meditatively.

"I was a young scamp, and gave my mother no end of trouble and anxiety. But there came a time when I turned squarely around and went the other way; and do you know, the scenes in which I was a torture to her have faded; I scarcely ever think of them! But I can feel the touch of her hand on my head and hear her voice saying, as she said it scores of times, 'My son, you are my daily joy.' What do you suppose I would take in exchange for such memories, now that my mother is gone?"

"Thank God," he added under his breath, for a tear was finding its way down the face of the man on the bed. Dr. McKenzie had been through such experiences before; he knew that the other look meant the kind of despair that often precedes self-destruction, and he knew that those great tears would relieve the tension.

He talked on cheerfully of his boyhood and young manhood; choosing his incidents almost at random, but shaping their trend with watchful care. And he made his goal. The man broke in upon him fiercely.

"There's no use in talking such things to me; you don't understand; I got away beyond where it would do any good."

"You haven't got beyond God."

The man raised his eyes for the first time, and studied his caller's face. The trend of his horrible thoughts was arrested. The calm assurance of the tone had fascinated him. He felt that the man was stating simply in a matter-of-course tone, what he knew to be an eternal truth. His manner conveyed the fact of God as a present Power. It was the same impression that the woman had made on his mind. These two, it seemed, knew a God who was a stranger to him. He waited for more, but his caller remained entirely silent, with an intent look fixed on his face. He stirred restlessly under the gaze; it seemed to penetrate him.

"I have tried everything!" he said at last, with the sullenness of despair.

"No, you haven't; you haven't tried God."

They were almost her very words! Why were these two so much alike?

"How do you know?" he asked suddenly, turning questioner himself.

"I know, because if you had you wouldn't be here in the condition that you are; the thing is impossible. I am a servant of his, and I understand his ways."

The man stared at him, curious.

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"Just what I say; if you had tried Jesus Christ, you wouldn't have failed."

"You don't know me," said the man, dropping back into apathy.

"True; but I know Jesus Christ, which is more to the point; and he knows you, better than you do yourself."

The man made a movement of impatience, and spoke fiercely.

"I'm not a child to be soothed with stories. I'm a broken-down, ruined man; drink is my curse, my devil! and he takes care to be always at my elbow. I have stronger reasons than any man who ever lived, for letting the cursed stuff alone, and I can't; I tell you I can't!" You think I haven't tried! God! if you knew my life!"

"I don't," said Dr. McKenzie in utmost quiet tone, "but Jesus Christ does. He was a man, subject to temptations from the same devils that torture you. What I said was—not that you haven't tried, but that you haven't tried Him; and I know you haven't, because he never fails."

"Why doesn't he save me, then?" Sarcasm, sullenness and despair were all instinct in this reply.

"Now look here," said Dr. McKenzie, sitting erect and fixing him with that keen gaze. "You say you are not a child; and I believe you. You are too much of a man to sit here and play with a solemn fact in this childish fashion. Perhaps Jesus Christ knows that the way he chose for saving men was the only one that in the last analysis would hold; perhaps he had some other reason; I don't pretend to understand him fully; a servant doesn't need to; but I know the fact that if you go to him in the way that he has appointed, he will save you. Why do you care to stop and fuss over the way? You are in a burning house; I know there is one way out of it, only one; I point it out to you. Would you stop to question why the builder didn't make other ways?"

"But suppose I didn't believe that there was a way out?"

"Man alive! you'd try it, wouldn't you, if you really wanted to get out?"

Then there was silence; a silence lasting so long that the Christian worker might have grown nervous, but he didn't; he was praying. At last, from the man on the bed:

"What do you want me to do?"

"Go to Jesus Christ."

"Go to him? You mean pray? Suppose I do not believe in what is called prayer?"

"Tell him so; no use in talking to me."

"Tell him that I don't believe in him! or at least in what men say about him?"

DO YOU WISH TO ADOPT A CHILD

WHO WILL BLESS YOUR NAME FOREVER?

WORD was sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD not long ago by one of our consecrated missionaries in China, that 600 little orphans in his own and neighboring fields must be somehow fed and clothed by our people. Kind-hearted men and women came forward to support 102 of these. There are nearly 500 still to be cared for. Who will do it?

Twenty dollars a year will pay the cost of food, clothing and Christian training for one of these little orphans. Thus he may be made into a self-supporting and useful citizen. Above all, he will be taught the Christian religion and will go forth, in all probability, to spread it among his brethren. There is no better way to help in the Christianizing of this mighty empire.

The work which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done among the orphans of India is well known to every reader of this journal. Many of these orphans have developed into earnest, efficient missionaries.

Here is an opportunity to impress upon China also the ideals and convictions which are dearest to all Christians. It is not often that one can put twenty dollars a year into a missionary investment which is likely to return him so definite and so sure a dividend.

These orphans vary in age from babyhood to fifteen or sixteen years. All of school age are receiving a thorough education, and many of them will become active Bible readers or preachers. The others will bear witness for Christ in their daily lives and will form an invaluable aid to the progress of our religion in China.

The missionaries in charge of the various orphanages in which these children are kept will write to the foster parent a fairly full description of each child, and will periodically report its progress. Those who have already adopted orphans in this way have found these frequent reports most interesting.

The life of a girl baby in China is usually miserable. If she is sick or deformed, or scarred, she is generally, as they say, "rolled out"; that is, she is thrown to the wolves and foxes. Several of the girls at the orphanage have been brought in from the woods, where they had been abandoned in this way.

One of the little boys, in the Tsing Kiang Pu Orphanage, was brought in by the workmen, pitifully thin and covered with terrible ulcers, which cannot be cured for many months; yet this child, so terribly handicapped, leads the whole school in scholarship. The teachers agree that his mind is wonderful, and all pray that the means may be forthcoming to send him through college and make him a preacher. Native preachers can, of course, far sooner than foreigners win the confidence of the people, and, if earnest and able, can do much more good.

The eldest boy there, fourteen years of age, belongs to a far better family than any of the rest. They were rich, but went down, down through opium smoking. At last floods and famine came, and swept away all of them except this boy. Even the very bricks of their house were carried off. He is well read and intelligent, and is trying to lead a Christian life. This is another who ought to be sent to college.

The boys not only study, but get industrial training. All of them knit their own stockings; and bales of carpet warp (Eaton's is good) would be acceptable, as it knits up well. The teachers hope that their American friends may be moved to send them gifts of soft carpet warp. The boys are proud of their knitting, and before long will probably be able to make money by it. The cotton they are using at present is hand-made, by Chinese women, and is coarse and uneven.

The boys also wash their clothes, and there is much emulation among them to see which can get his clothes cleanest. One of the boys, "Mark," has a wonderful knack with tools, and, though a dull scholar, will make a first-class carpenter. Such a man is greatly needed, for in the province in which the Tsing Kiang Pu Orphanage is situated there are no good carpenters. The teachers complain that their houses are "neither plumb nor steady; windows are badly hung, cupboards part at the seams, and chairs and tables fall to pieces in a short time." A good American missionary-carpenter is sadly needed there, they write, to teach the trade.

The girls are taught many household arts; and, as displayed in the picture at the head of the page, learn to take care of gardens. The stories told of many of these girls, and their rescue from the clutches of wicked men and women, are most touching.

Will you support a boy or girl? Or will you take more than one? They are looking to America for help, and we must not be found wanting.

Send us word at once regarding your preference as to the sex, age and denominational training of the child you wish to support. Immediately upon the receipt of your letter we will assign you a child, meeting, as far as our ability permits, all of your requirements, and we will put you into communication with the missionary in charge of him or her.

The work waits. Write as soon as possible. More children are coming in daily to the various Homes of our laborers in China, and the need of help presses. It is a wonderful chance to aid in a beautiful and most promising work for the Master.

If a little girl in China, among the poorer classes, lives through childhood she is liable to be sold.

A notorious criminal named Ti Long was captured, in 1904, in Shanghai. He was seventy years old, and had been engaged for over thirty years in the immensely profitable business of buying girls from his native province of Kiangsi, where the people are very poor, and sometimes part with their daughters for a few dollars each.

The books in this man's place showed that he had sold hundreds of girls, and usually into the vilest of hands. Eight poor little creatures were found on his premises and brought to the "Door of Hope," at Shanghai, largely supported by our readers. Among them was the child Ling-Sien, then known as "Little Cat." She was twelve years old, blind in one eye, dirty, wretched and frightened. She is now seventeen, a quiet, studious, Christian girl. When a glass eye was given her in our hospital her appearance was greatly improved. As she looked at herself in the mirror, after the change, she put her hand up to feel which was the glass eye, and exclaimed in her gratitude, "The wonderful foreigner!"

Two little girls of six and eight had been sold by their unfeeling parents to a vicious man of Shanghai. One was pretty, the other plain. The pretty one was petted, but the other was harshly treated. When they were found by the police, and brought to the Home, both were terribly scared, for they had heard only evil things of the "foreigners"; but they were soon won by kindness. When the plain one saw that she received the same love and attention that were given to the pretty one, she was filled with wonder and cried, "Do you love me the same as Kyung-ling? How strange! for I am not pretty."

Our workers bring in annually to the Door of Hope, at Shanghai, scores of these unfortunate little girls, often only seven or eight years old, never over fifteen. They frequently develop into beautiful and useful Christian women. If you would like to support one of these "Door of Hope" children, please indicate it.

AM I NOT HAPPY?

I am called "Goldleaf," for as I was brought by a beggar woman to the Gospel Hall here in Saratsi, just then came by the mail a ten dollar note from a lady friend in America. This friend to us poor Chinese children was not only unknown to me, but also to the missionary Obergs. God had moved her heart to send this money beforehand, and coming in that instant when I was carried here, my life was spared. I might otherwise have been thrown out to the dogs and wolves as many other girls have been. I am the first one received, and with me began this Orphan Home in Saratsi. I am so glad that Jesus opened the way for me and many others to come to this Home where we are taught to sing and pray to Jesus. As you don't know me—only a little Chinese girl—I would introduce myself to you in this way, for I am now a happy girl.

THE GREAT FLOOD SWEEPING DOWN THE VALLEY OF THE SANTA CATARINA

MORE HELP SENT TO MONTEREY

FROM far and near are coming answers to the appeal sent out by northern Mexico for aid in her pressing hour of need. The American government and the American people are beginning to show their friendship and sympathy for the flood-stricken people in a practical way, sending food to the starving and clothing and blankets to cover the shivering forms of the refugees, who are in a pitiable condition as a result of insufficient protection against cold and dampness during the last few weeks.

The American consuls are working in a way that causes the Mexicans to open their eyes in astonishment, and has filled their hearts with gratitude toward the country they represent.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD being actively engaged in the relief work, the State Department is in constant communication with Dr. Klopsch, to keep him informed as to the distribution of supplies and what is most needed.

Mr. Hanna wrote the latter part of September, as follows:

"Dr. Louis Klopsch:

"DEAR FRIEND—I wish, in behalf of very many afflicted people in northern Mexico, to thank you for the liberal contribution you made for the purpose of relieving their suffering. I have endeavored, to the best of my ability, to make good use of every cent of money expended and I assure you that nothing will be wasted. We have distributed a very large amount of clothing and many carloads of food, and we are sending food and supplies to the outlying towns and villages as fast as the railroads are repaired.

"With the coming on of the cold fall rains, these people, who have lost their little homes and are without food and shelter, will have to be cared for and housed or they will die from exposure. The loss of life has been something terrible, and the loss of property almost beyond comprehension. The crops and gardens throughout the country have been washed away, and the stocks of goods in the little towns have been swept down the creek, along with the buildings, so that in many of the towns it is almost impossible to obtain food. We are arranging to start an ox team from the end of the railroads, which will reach several of the villages.

Plain clothing, blankets and simple cooking utensils could be made good use of among these people; for those still living, who are afflicted, are of the poorer class and their demands for clothing are of the modest, simple sort.

"Again thanking you for your generous assistance, I have the honor to be,

"Very sincerely your friend,

"PHILIP C. HANNA,

"Consul-General."

Dr. Klopsch sent him the following telegram:

Hon. Philip C. Hanna, September 25, 1909.
American Consul-General, Monterey, Mexico.

Our people sympathize deeply with flood sufferers. We are ready to ship to you five thousand new single blankets for distribution through Mexican Red Cross. Please wire preference white or gray, heavy, medium, or light, cotton or part wool, and whether in sending they should go by freight or express, water or land line preferred. More help coming soon.

LOUIS KLOPSCH,
Editor of the Christian Herald.

Consul-General Hanna, who was in Mexico City on official business, at once wired as follows:

Dr. Louis Klopsch, Editor, The Christian Herald, New York:

Acknowledging your telegram, I earnestly request you to please ship by Wells-Fargo Express one thousand gray, heavy blankets, part wool. They are badly needed for the women and babies, as the nights are cold, increasing their suffering and endangering their lives. I will telegraph you in a day or two concerning the other four thousand blankets, all of which will be needed. Truly yours,

CONSUL-GENERAL HANNA.

The blankets were shipped at once. We are indebted to the Wells-Fargo Express Company for their free transportation to Mexico. These blankets, selected by an expert, will take, in great part, the place of coats and dresses; the Mexicans throw them about their shoulders, the folds falling below the knee. Readers of this paper who have already contributed to the Mexican Relief Fund will have the great satisfaction of knowing that their gifts, converted into food and blankets, are saving precious lives. Those who have not contributed have a glorious opportunity to save the lives of mothers who have lost their breadwinners, and feed and clothe the little ones, the babes for whom the Saviour himself showed so much interest and love.

These people must be saved from starvation, and clothed. Do not neglect this opportunity for real Christian service by feeding the hungry and clothing the naked. Send your contribution at once to the Mexican Relief Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

A STREET IN MONTEREY, AFTER THE WATERS BEGAN TO SUBSIDE

THE CENTENNIAL OF THE "DISCIPLES"

By WARREN G. PARTRIDGE, D.D.

THE International Centennial Celebration and Convention of the Disciples of Christ meet in Pittsburg October 11 to 19. This will be one of the largest religious conventions ever held in this country. The committee expect about 50,000 delegates and visitors.

The Disciples are often called the "Christian Church," and they have grown marvelously in recent years. They have now 11,000 churches and a membership of 1,332,702 communicants. The Disciples are very strong in the central West. A train load of delegates comes from Kansas City and another from California. Cleveland's delegation numbers 1,000. There are other special trains from Seattle, Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Des Moines, Lincoln, and other cities. Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Missouri and Kentucky come 5,000 strong.

The meetings are held in Carnegie Music Hall, Duquesne Garden, Forbes' Field and the leading churches of Pittsburg. There has been a vigorous campaign for four years to work up the enthusiasm of the churches. The centennial secretary has traveled about 35,000 miles a year, and a bureau has circulated millions of pages of literature. These people have a splendid vision of missions, and aim to raise $2,000,000 in one year for missions, benevolence and education, and to have 200,000 students in teacher-training classes. The campaign expense fund calls for $25,000.

There will be excursions to Bethany, W. Va.; Washington, Pa., and to Niagara Falls. The Disciples of Christ have held remarkable conventions in the past. In 1904 they had an attendance of 23,000 at St. Louis. They are now the sixth largest religious body in the United States. The watchword of the body has been the Restoration of Apostolic Unity, Purity and Power. They claim not to be a denomination, but a movement within the Church of Christ. There is a strong effort to have all the members "tithers," and 2,488 persons have so far enrolled at headquarters for this purpose. They are trying to have a roll of a million names. Two early arrivals are the rolls of Preston, Australia, and Rath, India.

The Disciples have made great strides in Sunday School work the past few years. September 26 was observed everywhere throughout the world as their supreme Bible School rally of the century. Seven thousand preachers spoke in the morning on "Where the Scriptures Speak," and in the evening on "A Generation of Bible Students." They aimed to have 2,500,000 in their Sunday Schools on that one Sunday.

The Disciples of Christ originated in Washington, Pa., in 1809. Then it was called the "Restoration Movement." Alexander Campbell was the founder of the movement. He was an Irish seceder minister, and he and his son led in this remarkable movement. Alexander Campbell wrote then his Declaration and Address, which produced a great awakening. The Brush Run Church building was the first house of worship. Here, in a small room of rough-hewn timbers, a little body of thirty odd rustic folk gathered from week to week. Little churches began to spring up. The first churches were stationed at Pittsburg, Dutch Fork, Washington, Allegheny, Braddock, Connellsville, Johnstown, Somerset, Sharon, Enon Valley, Library and Belle Vernon. These were the mother churches, and stood on the firing-line. Some of the great leaders, after Campbell, were Walter Scott, Samuel Church, James Darsie, Chauncey Forward, Weslie Larimer, Judge Jeremiah S. Black, Benedick, and L. P. Streator.

At the present convention the Christian Women's Board of Missions will have very interesting sessions, missionaries being present from India, Mexico, Jamaica, etc. One day will be given to the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ. This session will have a masculine and virile note. The general theme will be "A Man's Work in a Man's Way," and this will be the stirring crusade cry of the day. This religious body believes that the men of America have at last come into action on the highest plane of life. The Disciples stand for world-wide missions, and so this centennial will be largely a missionary convention.

The sessions of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society open October 13. The past year has seen great progress in the work in foreign fields. The builders expect to have the steamboat Oregon, for the Congo Mission, ready for dedication during the centennial. There will be, on each day, three parallel sessions. Two sessions will be given to the Church Extension and National Benevolence work. Reports will be presented of their orphanages, hospitals and homes. There will also be sessions devoted to the National Ministerial Association, the National Temperance Board, the Cause of Education and the Christian Endeavor Societies. The Board of Ministerial Relief will present the cause of "The Old Guard." Saturday, October 16, the Special Centennial Day, will be the grand review of a hundred years, and many suitable topics will be presented. A unique session will be "The Campfire of Veterans." Here will be related interesting reminiscences by the older soldiers of the Gospel Army. The Disciples propose to have the largest communion service ever held in the world. This immense throng will assemble in Forbes' Field, where 30,000 people have often gathered. It is the finest baseball park in the world, and, with the grandstands, cost $1,000,000. Bible School Day will be October 18. There will be three mass meetings at night. There will be a men's parade, reviewed by the women, and an award of an American flag to the State making the best showing. This will be a wonderful day, with the theme, "The Men of America for the Man of Galilee."

The closing day of the great convention will be devoted to Evangelism, and many famous exhorters will be heard in stirring addresses. There will be some very interesting exhibits, showing the progress and prospects of all the societies of the Disciples Church. There will also be many reunions and great banquets. One hundred plates will be laid for the Bethany banquet alone. In Bethany, W. Va., lives to-day, in a calm, quiet, serene old age, the tenth daughter of Alexander Campbell, Mrs. Decima Barclay, who, as the daughter of her father, shared with him the work of the beginning of the church. In Lexington, Ky., lives John W. McGarvey, president of the "College of the Bible," who was a graduate of Bethany College, established by Alexander Campbell, with whom McGarvey enjoyed a long friendship of brotherly love and communion.

Three Notable Men Gone

The Late Dr. Asa D. Blackburn

THE Rev. Asa D. Blackburn, who died in New York City on September 28, had been for the last fourteen years pastor of "The Church of the Strangers," of which the late Rev. Dr. Charles F. Deems was the founder. Dr. Blackburn was a native of Tennessee. His strong, earnest, evangelical preaching and his stanch orthodoxy won him a substantial following in New York, and under his pastoral charge the church grew and for nearly ten years past has occupied what was formerly the Mercer Street Presbyterian Church, where he preached to crowded audiences. Dr. Blackburn made many influential friends among the business men of New York. He was actively interested in mission and rescue work. For the last four years his failing health compelled him to reduce his labors. A few months ago he went to the mountains of Oregon, in hope of recuperation. He continued to fail, however, and four days after his return to New York he was taken to a hospital, where he died of nephritis. He was an occasional contributor to the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, where his descriptive sketches of Southern life found many appreciative readers.

A Famous Missionary Dead

REV. DR. GEORGE EDWARD POST, head of the Medical College in Beirut, Syria, and known throughout the civilized world for his splendid missionary work in Asia Minor, passed away in Beirut September 30, in his seventy-first year. Dr. Post was a native of New York, where he was educated in the University of New York and Union Theological Seminary. Having studied medicine, he was elected to the chair of surgery in the Syrian Protestant Hospital, Beirut, maintained by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, and held that position until his death. He was also surgeon to the Johanniret Hospital, Beirut. Among the honors he received for his work in the missionary and medical fields was the decoration of Othmaniyeh of Turkey, of the Ducal House of Saxony, and of the Red Eagle and Knight of Jerusalem of Germany.

Dr. Post was a distinguished member of many learned societies, and a prolific author. His Dictionary of the Bible has had a wide popularity, also his Bible Concordance. Among his other books are these: The Flora of Syria, Palestine and Egypt, Textbook of Botany, The Textbook of Mammalia, Textbook of Birds, translations of Butler's Physiology, and also a Textbook of Surgery. Some of his books have been published in several languages.

Published Moody and Sankey's Hymns

LUCIUS HORATIO BIGLOW, the well-known publisher and one of the founders of the music publishing firm of Biglow & Main, New York, died at Ridgefield, Conn., September 30. Mr. Biglow, who was in his seventy-seventh year, was senior partner of the firm, and also had extensive banking interests. Composers of sacred music, church congregations, pastors and evangelists all over the country recall the fact that the famous Moody and Sankey hymn collection was published by Mr. Biglow's firm, which issued millions of copies. Practically all of Fanny Crosby's beautiful hymns have been written for and issued by the same concern.

In addition to his business he was interested in many benevolences. He was the first contributor to the very earliest of the many charities for which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has appealed in the last twenty years. He was a man of many fine traits of character. Always a great lover of flowers, his horticultural collection at Ridgefield is one of the best in the country.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELISTS MEAD AND STALKER, of Benton, Ill., have just closed a five weeks' tent meeting at Centralia. Two hundred made profession of saving faith during this meeting.

—THE ROYAL TEMPLAR SOCIETY of Canada has just completed an "Auto-Veto Campaign." Public meetings were held in 93 municipalities, addressed by twenty distinguished speakers, assisted by a fine quartette. Five speakers at a time took turns in automobiles, holding 140 meetings in 40 days. It was the most extensive, thorough and strenuous campaign in the cause of temperance ever attempted in Canada.

—THE TWENTY-FIFTH year of work was begun September 22 by the International Young Men's Christian Association Training School of Springfield, Mass. Professor John M. Tyler, of Amherst College, and members of the board of trustees addressed those present at the opening exercises, who crowded the chapel to its doors. The entering class this year, numbering more than seventy, is the largest in its history, and the roll-call showed a total student body of nearly one hundred and fifty.

—REV. WILLIAM HURLIN, a short account of whose work appeared in our issue of September 22, was from 1835 to 1840 a gratuitous lay preacher, supporting himself and family by secular business. From 1840 to 1849 he was a salaried London city missionary. As an ordained Baptist minister, from 1849 to the present time, he has of course received a salary while a pastor of churches and also while secretary of the New Hampshire Baptist Convention, from 1878 to 1900, and as occasional supply for churches, except when he has chosen to render gratuitous service.

Called Higher

J. D. Nicholson, of Hinton, Okla., was called higher recently. He had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD many years.

Mrs. J. O. Denniss, of Platteville, Colo., passed away December 19, 1908. A most devoted wife and mother, and a sincere Christian.

John L. Van Meter, of Lakeside, Wash., was called to his rest April 6, 1909, aged eighty-eight years. He had been a member of the church from his youth.

Mrs. Maria A. Allen died January 7, at her home in Leominster, Mass. She was eighty-one years old, and had been a faithful and devoted follower of the Saviour from her girlhood.

M. L. Huffman, of Lebanon, Texas, has entered into rest, aged eighty-two years. He was a life-long member of the Baptist Church, and an appreciative reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. S. S. Livingston, of Stuart, Ia., at the age of seventy-six years, has gone to be with Christ. Next to her Bible she loved THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and found a corresponding comfort in reviewing the old files as well as numbers of later date.

Martin T. Cross, one of the early pioneers of McCook County, South Dakota, passed away recently at his home in Montrose. He was born in St. Lawrence County, New York, in 1836. He served for two years in the war to preserve the Union. He was a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was a writer of considerable ability. He was buried in his army uniform, and former comrades were the pallbearers.

SATURDAY NIGHT IS "TUB NIGHT".

It is the night when ALL the little ones are given what the French call "The Grand Bath"—a thorough cleansing from top to toe.

In this weekly function, Ivory Soap plays an important part. A white soap, it yields a snow-white lather—a lather that cleanses but does not harm.

Ivory Soap has another advantage over most bath soaps—it floats. If you happen to drop a cake of Ivory in the bath tub, up, up it comes to the surface of the water.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

Ivory Soap . . . . . It Floats.

THE McCool $25 Typewriter

A strictly first-class business typewriter for business use

Will do ALL you could ask of any typewriter. Side by side you cannot tell the difference between a letter written on the McCool and on a $100 machine. Will handle all correspondence required of any machine.

Sold direct from factory to you. Every middle profit cut out. Saves 45% in price. Only 319 PARTS against 2500 AND MORE in the high priced typewriters. This saves 30% in price.

We have over half a million dollars invested in our big manufacturing plant, covering five acres—one of the largest in the country.

The McCool is made in our factory. We buy material for 15,000 to 20,000 typewriters at a time.

Every one of the 319 parts of the McCool is selected, put to supreme test for quality and accuracy. Every bearing and wearing surface is of hardened steel, finished to microscopical fineness, adjusted by micrometer.

The price recommends the McCOOL to business houses and merchants; particularly the smaller merchant, lawyer, clergyman, student, physician, teacher, where a typewriter has heretofore been thought prohibitive in price.

If you never saw a typewriter you can write on the McCOOL. Very simple. Nothing to learn but the keyboard.

The McCool Typewriter is unqualifiedly guaranteed in every way.

Shipped anywhere, carefully packed and boxed, delivered to any Express Company for $25.00. This is our factory price—absolutely the lowest ever made on a first-class typewriter. The Express charges vary with distances, but add very little to this our factory price.

You are perfectly safe. Remit $25. Test the McCOOL 10 days in the privacy of your office or home. If it fails in any way to meet your expectations, if you do not find it even BETTER than we have described—a handsome machine, greatly superior in every way—your money and express charges will be refunded promptly without argument. You have absolutely nothing to lose.

For $2.50 additional we will include a substantial Wood, Leatherette Covered Carrying Case with Brass Yale Lock and Key, Side Clasps, Genuine Leather Handles. A handsome, practical outfit, which with the Typewriter is about the size and weight of a hand grip.

You MUST READ our handsome illustrated Booklet fully describing the McCOOL Typewriter—the achievement of the century in typewriter construction. Free on request.

A NEW MAN IN CHRIST*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

A MASTERPIECE of oratory, one of the greatest, if not the greatest ever heard in the world, is the speech of the apostle Paul before King Agrippa. Let us study the elements of its greatness. It was courteous, although delivered in chains before potentates, who not only did not sympathize with the speaker, but were antagonistic. One, Festus, is a man wholly Roman; and the other, Agrippa, a man well acquainted with things Jewish, and of Sadduceeic tendencies, which involved a sacerdotal aristocracy: entire moral freedom of man, to the exclusion of divine government of the world; the belief that the soul died with the body, hence no resurrection.

The other person in the royal audience was the unspeakable sister, sometime wife of Agrippa, Bernice. And yet Paul was courteous, having in mind not so much the personalities before him as the offices which they represented as rulers. "Obey them that have the rule over you" was one of the principles declared by Paul (Heb. 13:17). He had learned it from the Lord Jesus, who had said: "Render therefore unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." A man only shows his weakness and smallness when he is discourteous toward those with whom he has a difference. On the other hand, to refrain from making countercharges, to maintain a dignified composure when one's character or person is in the hands of the enemy, goes a long way to establish the good opinion of others.

Paul's Theme

The theme was the most exalted possible. Agrippa had said, looking into the face of Paul, a prisoner in chains between two soldiers, "Thou art permitted to speak for thyself." Both Festus and Agrippa had expected that Paul would speak of his claims as a Roman citizen, and of his appeal to Cæsar, but those were subjects too small for the present opportunity. He chose rather to speak of the Lord Jesus and his power over men, the grandest of all themes. He took his own life for an illustration. He acknowledged himself as having been a hard-headed Pharisee; "after the straitest sect of our religion, I lived a Pharisee," the most uncompromising sort of a person that can be imagined. The laws of the Pharisees greatly outnumbered the laws of God given to Moses, and dealt with infinitesimal matters, such as the law of the Sabbath: one must not walk on the grass on the Sabbath, because it would be threshing; nor catch a flea, which would be a kind of hunting; nor wear nailed shoes, because it would be burden bearing; nor suffer any grain of corn to lie on the ground in feeding fowls, lest it should develop into planting; a loose handkerchief in the pocket was a forbidden burden; also a fan to chase away flies was a burden! And that had been Paul's bringing up. He did not recount all of these things before King Agrippa, but in declaring that he had lived a Pharisee he included them all, and Agrippa understood him and was undoubtedly well pleased to hear the Pharisees referred to unfavorably. But his satisfaction did not last long, for in the next breath Paul referred to the Sadducees' unbelief in the resurrection. That was a home thrust on the part of Paul, and then he declared that it had not only been possible for Jesus to raise dead bodies to life, but what was even greater, to transform sinful men into true and noble characters.

There was no egotism in Paul taking himself as an illustration. He wanted his hearers to know how he had been led from being a hard-headed Pharisee to being a preacher of righteousness in the Lord Jesus. And so he told the whole story of his transformation, beginning with how he had started out from Jerusalem to persecute the Christians in Damascus; how the Lord Jesus had met him on the way, revealing himself by a light from heaven; and how Jesus had spoken sorrowful words of reproof to him, and then inspiring words concerning the mission he had in view for him to preach the Gospel at Damascus, at Jerusalem, in all the country of Judea, and to the Gentiles in all the world. And then in an impassioned manner Paul exclaimed, "O King Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision." It was necessary that Paul should refer to the efforts of the Jews to kill him in the temple in order that King Agrippa might know that he had passed through trials in his obedience to the heavenly vision and so had been tested, and by the grace of the Lord Jesus had been delivered in soul and body.

Paul was indeed a new man in Christ. He was a living embodiment of the power of Jesus over the resurrection, far greater than if the son of the Widow of Nain, whom Jesus had raised to life, or if Lazarus had stood before them, because resurrection of soul is greater than the resurrection of the body.

The impression made by Paul's speech. That both Festus and Agrippa felt the power of Paul's impassioned oratory is clearly shown. Festus declared him insane, "mad," because of his much learning. And Agrippa said, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Paul was still courteous as he replied first to Festus and then to Agrippa. There has been considerable study on the part of Christian scholars given to the saying of Agrippa. Some have thought that he spoke satirically, that Paul with a little persuasion would make him a Christian; but we are disposed rather to think it was a tribute to the oratory of Paul—that under its spell he was almost inclined to become a Christian himself. That Paul did not, or would not, consider his words a satire is shown by the sequel, for he looked upon Agrippa, and then upon all around them, and expressed the wish that they might all be as he was, in the mind and spirit of Jesus Christ, like himself, through the power of God, but without the prison bonds. And then Paul was returned to prison. How could the rulers have the heart and mind to do it, after what they had seen and heard? They would gladly have released him, but he had appealed to a higher authority than theirs for trial, to the great Cæsar, and unto Cæsar, in Rome, he must be sent.

Paul Not the Only One

If Paul had been the only one whose manhood was resurrected in the power of Jesus we might have some reason for discouragement. But there was Matthew, a despised publican sitting at the receipt of custom, and whether he deserved it or not there were charges against his character — t h i e f and publican were considered synonymous, because the publicans as tax collectors defrauded the people; sometimes, if not always. But by the power of Jesus Matthew was transformed, becoming not only an apostle but one of the writers of the Gospels.

Nero, to Whom Paul Appealed

Then there was Zaccheus, another publican. Jesus probably saw him for the first time, as he was peering curiously at him down through the branches of the sycamore tree, as he was passing through the streets of Jericho. It took more than a word to transform that sinner, for he had laid hold on a lot of money that did not belong to him. He was a very high sort of a highway robber, in the guise of a publican. But Jesus knew his possibilities for good, and, looking up through the tree, said, "Zaccheus, make haste and come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house." He did come down, and Jesus went with him to his home. All men marveled; they did not know the purpose nor the power of Jesus. There was to be a resurrection that day in the home of Zaccheus, when Zaccheus should become alive to all that was honest and good and true. And so it was that before Jesus left his home, probably the next day, Zaccheus proposed a righteous distribution of his property: "Lord, behold, half of my goods I give to the poor, and what I have wrongfully taken I will restore it fourfold." And when the hour came for Jesus to leave his home how different was the man Zaccheus from the one with whom Jesus had entered the house! Perhaps Zaccheus did not become a preacher of righteousness as Paul did, but he certainly became a doer of righteousness.

And there was a woman who was a sinner, who came herself into the presence of Jesus as he was dining with a Pharisee. She did not presume to ask for a place among the guests, but she knelt at the feet of Jesus and wept, and washed his feet with her tears and wiped them with her long hair, and anointed his feet with precious perfume. She wanted Jesus to help her be good, and he wanted to help her. And in that very hour there was a resurrection in her soul, for Jesus said to those about him, "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much." And to the woman herself he said, "Thy sins are forgiven. Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace." We are not told her name, nor what she did afterward, but we know that she never again followed a sinful life. We love to think of her as one of the holy women who followed Jesus to the death on Calvary, and afterward among those who came first to his tomb on that Sabbath morning before it was light.

How wonderfully were the apostles of Jesus transformed from being common fishermen and laborers into the successors of Christ in his work of teaching men the way of life, and healing their infirmities! The three years' daily companionship they had with Jesus wrought in them character like unto their Master, and when the Holy Spirit descended upon them, after those days of waiting in the upper room, they were still better prepared for the work Jesus had given them to do of preaching the Gospel to the whole world. So completely was Peter transformed from being a disciple who feared to own his Lord that he was able to preach a sermon which led three thousand souls to Christ in one day! All through the book of Acts we read of the marvelous words and works of the apostles, done through the power of J e s u s working through them. "He who began a good work in you will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1:6).

Christ is the same yesterday, to-day and forever, and God is no respecter of persons. "In every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is acceptable to him."

Two friends, one an army officer, met after an interval of ten years. They were much attached to each other, and shook hands cordially. After a little chat the civilian, looking at the other man with a curious air, observed: "By the way, general, they tell me you have gone mad over religion. Is there really anything in the report?" "Well," responded the general, "I'm not aware of being crazy; so far as I know, I am in the enjoyment of my senses. But you know there is one comfort: If I am out of my head, I've got Jesus Christ for my keeper and heaven for my lunatic asylum, so I think I shan't do badly after all."

Clothing for Armenia's Sufferers

THE Armenian Relief Committee of the Protestant Evangelical Church of America has begun a movement in aid of the survivors of the recent massacres. Two members of the Ladies' Aid Society, Mrs. A. Sariyan and Miss P. Godson, are now collecting funds and clothing for the sufferers. The Hamburg-American Line has offered to ship six cases of clothing free to Mersina, Asia Minor. Clothing and shoes are being received by the committee at 508 West 145th Street, New York, where Mr. Lawson has given the temporary use of a store. The gifts come from all directions. Among the contributors are Mr. A. Simon, dry goods dealer; Mr. L. M. Blumstien, dry goods; American Express Company, free transportation, per the manager, Mr. H. S. Julier. Six cases of clothing have been granted free shipment by the Hamburg-American Line, and six more cases shipped free to Trieste by the Cunard Steamship Company. From Trieste free shipment to Mersina was secured by Mr. H. M. Kirctchjian. Messrs. A. & M. Karaghensian donated a case of yard goods and underwear. Rev. G. Moonijian, of West Hoboken, N. J., was one of the most successful collectors. Six additional cases are now being sent by Mr. Kharpuatlian free, by way of Boston. The Adams Express Company, through Manager McKay, delivered the goods free to the steamship piers. The committee is grateful to all the donors and the express and steamship companies for their services and hearty co-operation. A letter received from Mrs. Thomas D. Christie, of Tarsus, expresses her gratification at the news of this movement, as there is great need of such aid at present. Fifteen thousand to twenty thousand refugees will have to be helped for several months to come. All the cases were sent to Professor Thomas D. Christie, principal of the American College, Tarsus, care of the United States Consul, Mersina.

Dr. George H. Godson, 301 West 114th Street, New York, secretary of the committee, will reply to all inquiries by readers of this journal.

Questions and Answers

J. L., Pittsburg, Pa. Upon what ground is the claim made that the Hudson was discovered prior to the voyage of Hudson, in 1609?

The Celebration Committee admits in its publications that the Florentine, Giovanni da Verrazani, in 1524, sailed into New York Bay and discovered the mouth of the river; but Hudson was the first to explore it to the head of navigation and to give to the world an authentic report of its extent and resources, hence he is regarded as its true discoverer.

E. F., Richlands, N. C. Did the antediluvians know and speak in their new tongue at once after the "confusion of tongues," at the Tower of Babel, or did they grow into it?

The Confusion was long after the Deluge, probably several centuries. A peaceful and orderly distribution and migration had been divinely ordained, but there was a large part of mankind who would not conform to this arrangement. They liked that region, and resolved to stay there. In punishment for this rebellion they were afflicted with an affection of the vocal organs, which produced discord and separation and misunderstanding. Many noted scholars have written on this "confusion of tongues," some holding that it was simply dialectic differences that appeared and which so transformed the original language that people could not understand each other. One thing is clear from the Bible narrative: that they were scattered abroad, and thus each group, in its new environment, gradually learned new methods of speech, largely or wholly superseding the old language, which was never restored.

J. T. Y., East Orange, N. J. Please tell something of one Tristram, a writer on the Holy Land.

He is the author of a work upon Landscapes of the Bible and Their Stories, published by I. Spottiswoode, London, England.

M. M., Fresno, Calif. 1. What is the most compact definition of socialism? 2. What is the best handbook on the subject?

1. Lavaleye, in his book entitled Contemporary Socialism, defines it briefly in these words: "It is the aspiration for the amelioration of society, carried into practical operation." There are many, however, who do not agree with this definition. 2. The best work on the subject is Bliss' Handbook of Socialism, published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

B. S., Decatur, Ia. What should be the Christian's attitude toward amusements? To what extent might he indulge, and to what extent deny?

Not an easy question. It is almost as much of a mistake to be too rigid as too lax. However, to be very brief, we should say that all amusements that are questionable should be left absolutely alone, because: (1) they are sinful; (2) they are destructive of our own personal character; (3) they give a pernicious example to others, for the results of which we are morally responsible. This applies to dancing, theatres, cards and all gambling games, bad company and late hours. There are plenty of clean, wholesome amusements to choose from which will afford entertainment without loss of character or twinges of conscience.

A. C. B., Lebanon, Neb. Do the Jews of America continue the burnt offerings, according to the Mosaic command, and if so where?

We have referred this question to the editor of The Hebrew Standard, New York City, the leading Jewish family paper, who sends us this reply: "Since the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (70 A.D.), no sacrifices whatever are offered by the Jews in their synagogues, or anywhere else. The law of Moses emphatically prohibits the offering up of any animal sacrifice outside of the temple at Jerusalem (Deut. 12:13, 14). There are, however, some reminiscences of the ancient sacrifices to be found in some Jewish customs, as, for instance, the use of a roasted shankbone of a lamb on the eve of Passover. But that is merely a reminder of the Paschal lamb, and has absolutely no sacrificial meaning. The following extract from the Authorized Daily Hebrew Prayer Book (English) clearly states the present position of the Jews in regard to sacrifices:

"'But on account of our sins we were exiled from our land, and removed far from our country, and we are unable to go up in order to appear and prostrate ourselves before thee and to fulfil our obligations in thy chosen house. . . . May it be thy will, O Lord our God and God of our fathers, merciful King, that thou mayest again in thine abundant compassion have mercy upon us and upon thy sanctuary, and mayest speedily rebuild it and magnify its glory. Our Father, our King, do thou speedily make the glory of thy kingdom manifest upon us; shine forth and exalt thyself upon us in the sight of all living; bring our scattered ones among the nations near unto thee, and gather our dispersed from the ends of the earth. Lead us with exultation unto Zion, thy city, and unto Jerusalem, the place of thy sanctuary, with everlasting joy; and there we will prepare before thee the offerings that are obligatory for us, the continual offerings according to their order, and the additional offerings, according to their enactment.'"

M. C. B., Towson, Md. How can a country church, in a sparsely settled community, earn money for a new carpet and other needed furnishings?

There are many kinds of entertainments for raising money in country churches, such as an orange fair, in which everything for sale is orange colored, so far as possible (other colors can be used in the same way); a book party, in which each individual personates a book, and votes regarding the title of each cost a small

China's Most Sacred Shrine

THE Temple of Confucius is at Ch'u Fu Hsien (Hsien), in the province of Shan Tung, China. There are ten monolithic, elaborately carved columns along the front veranda. His grave, a conical mound of earth, is in a large wooded enclosure of several hundred acres, about a mile north of the city. The Sage lived 500 years before Christ, being contemporaneous with Socrates. For many hundreds of years after his death, he was not regarded as superior to other ancient worthies, and it was only after seventeen centuries that he became famous. And this was not on account of any claim of his own. His countrymen, at that late date, began to appreciate his merit, and agreed in assigning him this lofty eminence. Since the new learning has, of late, made such great advances in China, the ultra-conservatives, in a spasm of loyalty for the glory and prestige of their venerable sage, induced the government to exalt Confucius, by special decree, to an incomparable height, making him a god, "the equal of heaven and earth." In this great temple is an image of Confucius, before which is a spacious table on which are offered pigs, sheep and cattle to him in sacrifice. This rare photograph was sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Missionary George A. Verity of Tai-an-Fu.

44 Volumes

EX-PRESIDENT ELIOT of Harvard, "first private citizen of America," says that the books a cultured person must read will go on a shelf 5 feet long.

But you will be glad to know that the Review of Reviews, after nine years of preparation, has just completed a work whose 44 exquisite volumes fill only three feet of bookshelf, and into which Hamilton Wright Mabie, Dr. Henry Van Dyke, Bliss Perry, George Iles and Tom Masson, as editors, have put a vastly more comprehensive, useful, readable and necessary private library than Ex-President Eliot could possibly get into his five foot bookshelf.

Ex-President Eliot himself says of one section of this Masterpiece Library, which he saw before the whole was completed, "I know of no more complete and delightful selection than that which you offer the public in these charming volumes."

Other attempts at such a collection cost from one hundred to five hundred dollars. And there never has been one with a board of editors equal to that of the Masterpiece Library. This one will cost you less than 50 cents a volume.

The Masterpiece Library

In this set you have the best work of--Milton, Bacon, Swift, Goldsmith, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Scott, Thackeray, Dickens, Eliot, Browning, Stevenson, Barrie, Voltaire, Balzac, Daudet, de Maupassant, Zola, Goethe, Heine, Boccaccio, Hoffman, Turgenieff, Tolstoi, Franklin, Lincoln, Longfellow, Lowell, Hawthorne, Mark Twain, Howells,--- and hundreds more of the world's greatest writers. Much of the material is copyrighted and much appears in English for the first time. The editors contribute critical essays, which are "the last word" on their subjects.

There is not one selection in the books which you can afford not to read. You will read them—not once, but many times, because of their beauty, their sparkle and their intense interest

J. B. W., Fairmount, Ind. What is the difference between regeneration and the baptism of the Holy Spirit?

They are part of one process—the work of the Holy Spirit. Regeneration is the new birth by which we experience a change of heart, and it is the work of the Holy Spirit. Titus 3:5 speaks of "the washing of regeneration." We are made members of the visible Church of Christ by haptism and renewed in the Spirit by the Holy Ghost. The "higher baptism," or the bestowment of the Spirit upon faithful believers, often differs greatly in degree, but it is identical in character and is the universal privilege of all Christians.

H. B. W., Boston, Mass. As I am a constant reader of your paper I wish to ask what is best for me to do, or not to do, as to changing my orthodox religion for Christian Science? Not being in good health, I am advised by Christian Seience people to "come in with them, be cured, and have a religion that ignores other sects as frauds." I hate to give up my long-cherished chureh.

You would do well to distrust advisers who abuse Christian churches and people. Stick to your own church and to the religion of your father and mother. God is both pardoner and healer (see Psalm 103:3), and we have Christ's own assurance that the Father is able to do for you all that your faith can ask. See Luke 11:9, 10; John 14:13; John 15:16; I. John 3:22; I. John 5:14. No faith or form of religion has a monopoly of God's gifts.

A. H. W., Greenland, N. H. How should John 14:6 be interpreted?

Christ here spoke of himself in a threefold sense: as the Way, because he is the mediator between God and man; as the Truth, because he is the incarnate God, and the revelation through which we get a knowledge of the Father (see Col. 1:19); and as the Life, because he brings life and immortality to light (see I. John 5:20). In the closing clause he points out that it is only through his mediation, and by the use of the means he enjoins, that we can come acceptably before God. Professor Weiss says of this passage: "He is speaking of his going to the Father and his heavenly dwelling, and the Way to this he is himself, as he is the one medium of the Truth through which here on earth they can attain true spiritual life, and without which they cannot reach the life beyond."

G. W. H., Holland, Mich. What is meant in Rev. 20:1-3?

To understand this chapter the preceding one must be read, as both are closely related. Chapter 18 recites the punishment of Babylon, or Antichrist; chapter 19 describes the rejoicing in heaven, and closes with the battle of Armageddon, or the final triumph of the truth over unbelief. The real conflict is between Christ and Satan. Antichrist had destroyed all false systems of religion to make room for his own, hence his destruction swept away all irreligion. The binding of Satan for a thousand years implies complete bondage, or imprisonment, the word "thousand" symbolizing perfection.

W. M. T., Dormis, Mo. I noticed an article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 8, in "Our Editorial Forum," entitled "The Support of the Gospel." You speak of the "Great Commission." In Mark 16:15 I find that Jesus said, "Go ye into all the world and preaeh the Gospel to every creature." In verse 20 it says they did so; the signs, as promised, followed "them that believe." Also, in Col. 1:23, Paul says the Gospel was preached to every creature which is under heaven. I should like to know why, if that commission is in force to-day, those signs do not follow "them that believe," as Mark recorded Jesus promised? If that commission is not in force, then why should we concern ourselves in supporting missionaries, etc.? The commission, as recorded by Matthew, seems to imply that it is in full force, "even unto the end of the world." What is the matter that the confirming signs do not follow—unbelief?

Paul's radius of action was limited. "All the world," in his time, knew nothing of the millions of South and Central Africa, Farther Asia, Australia and its neighbors, the Western Continent and the islands of the seas. The Commission is still in force and will remain so until disciples have been made in "all the nations," as Jesus said in Matt. 28:19, 20. Nowhere, however, are we told that the whole world is to be converted through this work. The duty enjoined is simply to preach to all nations, baptize and teach. Ours is the sowing and planting and the preparation of the spiritual soil, but the harvest is the Lord's. (See I. Cor. 3:6, 7.) Unbelief will continue to exist until the end of the age, but the signs are not wanting of real Gospel progress in many lands, heathen as well as eivilized. The last one hundred years have been the greatest sinee Paul's time in Gospel effort, but there are lands yet almost unreached by the truth, notably Tibet, interior China and certain other parts of Asia, also portions of Central Africa and some of the tribes of South America.

W. S. F., San Jose, Calif. Please explain Matt. 16:28.

Mark has the preferable interpretation, "Until they see the kingdom of God come with power" (Mark 9:1). And the same idea is conveyed in Luke 9:27. This did not refer to the second advent, but to the firm establishment and victorious progress, during the lives of some of those present, of the new kingdom of Christ, which was to revolutionize the world.

A. K. S., Smithville. What is meant by "the wood devoured more people that day than the sword devoured" (II. Sam. 18:8)?

This apparently obscure passage means that the thick forests of oak and terebinth, by obstructing the flight, greatly aided the victors in the pursuit and caused more of the foe to be slain in the retreat than were killed in the battle itself. Josephus, the Jewish historian, confirms this view in Antiquities, Book VII, Chapter 10.

G. W. C., Devol, Okla. We believe the two authors you mentioned believed firmly in God as the Creator. We are unable to answer your second question.

W. K. Q., Salisbury, N. C. Dr. Eliot is a Unitarian and believes in God, but not in the divinity of Jesus Christ. The book you ask for can be procured by writing to John Wanamaker, New York City.

H. D., Eureka, Calif. To enumerate the various predictions and forecasts in history, that have been ultimately verified, would be impossible, as there are no available data.

Reader, South Carolina. It means that the hand of God was laid upon him in the form of some sudden seizure or malady, that caused him to subject his own heart to a searching examination.

W. K. R., Adairville, Ky. Some hold that recognition may be immediate, others that it comes after a period has elapsed. Nobody should dogmatize in such matters. A little book, entitled The Life Beyond, might help you. Get it through any good publisher.

Mrs. S., Asbury Park, N. J. The Christian powers could at any time have stopped the Armenian massacres, if their diverse interests had not rendered united action impracticable. In this sense, selfishness on the part of the so-called Christian powers has been responsible for the continuance of massacres.

A reader, J. A. Pollard, of Nebraska, sends the following in regard to a recent statement in THE MAIL-BAG: "In your issue dated August 25 you state that 'In 1790 there were seventeen slaves in Vermont.' This is an erroneous statement, that has often been made. There were no slaves in Vermont in 1790, or at any other time. The error arose from some census compilers putting the seventeen 'Indians not taxed' into the eolumn for slaves."

Constant Reader, Newark, N. J. We have no right to judge on a one-sided presentation of the case. Your pastor may be quite aetive, socially, and yet have a deep spiritual nature, which you may never have been fortunate enough to touch. Why not speak with him kindly, not in a spirit of fault-finding, concerning the questions of which you write? If you go about this discreetly, you may accomplish much good.

"Mother, You're All Right"

The association of mother and daughter is usually very close. Praise of face, or form, or character by either to the other means much more than the casual compliment of friends who want to be polite. When the daughter can look into the fresh, smooth, youthful face of her white-haired mother and say "Mother, you're all right" she is paying sincere tribute to her mother and in most cases she is also giving praise to the wonder-working power of

Their Prayer Won a Pastor*

A PROTESTANT Mission was established in the city of Cebu and rapidly developed a helpful influence throughout the island. One day one of our missionaries was used of God to win one of the mountaineers to Christ. This man urged the missionary to go up to the mountains with him to tell his people about the Saviour.

The missionary gladly consented to go, though warned by the constabulary that his life would be in danger. After a few weeks he came down to Cebu, with a squad of mountaineers, who took the oath of allegiance under our flag and joined the Protestant Church. Back into the mountains he went again and, after a time, returned to the city with a second company of willing recruits both for citizenship and church membership. This good work continued until practically the entire mountain community became Christian. Life and property became secure in the island as lawlessness ceased. The constabulary confessed that this one missionary had accomplished more than all of their number combined to secure this desirable end. It would seem to be a good thing at times for our government to make an appropriation to foreign missions as a good police proposition.

The Sunday before we reached the city of Cebu the last of these mountaineers had been welcomed into the Protestant Church. Some of the leaders among the Christians in the mountain community came down to the city. For some time they had been praying for a minister who could be their pastor and teacher. When they made known their desires to the missionaries, they were told that no man was available at that time; but that the school for training evangelists at Manila was making good progress, and that they should have one of the very first men from that school. But they replied that they had prayed about it and were sure that God had heard their prayers. Again the missionary explained that there were only two native ministers in the island, and that it would be necessary for them to wait patiently until another man could be secured.

But the mountaineers were not to be moved from their conviction that God had heard their prayers for a minister, and they quietly announced that they would not leave Cebu without him. The missionaries were puzzled. Finally it occurred to them that these people wanted a minister more eagerly than most of the islanders, and they agreed to send for one of the native evangelists and transfer him to this new field. This was done, and, after a few days more of waiting, the mountaineers took their new minister home with them. They had tasted of the Bread of Life, and they knew it was good for their souls and they hungered for more.

Hudson's Wonderful Voyage

The Return of the Half Moon, by Diedrick Crayon, Jr., is a timely tale dealing with much of the unwritten history of Hudson's famous voyage. Imaginative, humorous and entertaining, it recounts, in the style of Washington Irving, many stirring and laughable events which might have taken place, and reveals the contents of a mysterious sealed packet, dealing with the Half Moon's wonderful journey and the strange adventures attending it. All of the famous American characters, from Rip Van Winkle to Artemus Ward, from Washington to Commodore Vanderbilt, and from Hiawatha to Captain Kidd, are on the stage of action, and the setting is a merry one from first to last. 150 pages. Cloth, illustrated. $1. Broadway Publishing Company, New York and Baltimore, publishers.

Books Received

Coming Motherhood. By Louis A. Spaeth, M.D. Practical suggestions relating to maternity and the care of infants and children. Cloth binding. Pp. 93. Price $1.00. Peter Reilly, 133 North Thirteenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., publisher.

The Forest Runners. A Story of the Great War Trail in Early Kentucky. By Joseph A. Altsheler. $1.50. D. Appleton & Co., New York. Indians and heroic white boys and men run and fight, lie in ambush and sail the Southern rivers in this lively and imaginative tale, which has some slight basis in history.

Forward Pass. A story of the "new football." By Ralph Henry Barbour, author of The Spirit of the School, etc. D. Appleton & Co., New York. $1.50. A "rattling," lively story of school life, glorifying football. With this exception, its tone is good, and it is capitally written.

Junior Topics Outlined, 1908. A Lesson for Every Meeting, Illustrated by Object Lessons, Chalk Talks, Illustrative Stories, Missionary and Temperance Plans. By Ella N. Wood. Cloth covers; pp. 131. Price 50 cents. United Society of Christian Endeavor, Boston and Chicago, publishers.

The Brother and the Brotherhood. By Ira Seymour Dodd, author of A Lesson from an Upper Room, The Song of the Rappahannock, etc. $1.50. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York. A volume of well-written sermons by a New York City pastor, whose church, however, "stands embowered amid great trees, which are relics of the primeval forest." Seldom are seen more Scriptural discourses than these. Their illustrations are almost wholly Biblical, and the modern interpretation of Christ's great doctrine of God's fatherhood and man's brotherhood runs like a golden thread through them all.

The Battle of Franklin (November 30, 1864). The Bloodiest Engagement of the War Between the States. By R. W. Banks, Captain Company D, Thirty-seventh Mississippi Consolidated Infantry; Lieut.-Col. Commanding Third Mississippi Infantry, Spanish-American War. The Neale Publishing Company, New York. $1.25. A detailed description of a great battle, especially valuable for historians of the period. Some of the realistic descriptions will help the war novelists, for they are well done.

She Wanted to Vote, or Home Influences. By Eva C. Ballard. T. C. Ballard, Crawfordsville, Ind. $1.40. A crude but sincere presentation of the case of a mother and daughter who cared more for public life than for their home, and thereby came to deep grief. The women thus portrayed are of an unusual type, and it is doubtful if there are a dozen such in the world.

The Book of Princes and Princesses. By Mrs. Lang, edited by Andrew Lang. A collection of true stories, giving the childhood days, and those following, of many who are well known in history. These tales are so charmingly and well told that all who read them will be sure to enjoy them, at the same time acquiring much interesting information. Beautifully bound, with decorative covers and gilt edges. Illustrated with superbly colored plates and numerous other illustrations, by H. J. Ford. Pp. 361. Price $1.60. Longmans, Green & Co., New York.

Peerless Alaska; Our Cache Near the Pole. By Charles Hallock, M.A., Founder of Forest and Stream and Dean of American Sportsmen. Illustrated from sketches by George G. Cantwell. Broadway Publishing Company, New York. $1.25. An enthusiastic treatise upon Alaska, its scenery, resources and civilization. Rev. Sheldon Jackson writes the introduction; and he receives, in Mr. Hallock's ardent phrase, the praise which he deserves, in the chapter upon Alaskan Missions. A most interesting book, written by a practiced and skilful hand.

Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. Reports of the First Meeting of the Federal Council, Philadelphia, 1908. Edited by Elias B. Sanford, D.D., Corresponding Secretary. The Revell Press, New York. In the introduction to this volume we are told by the editor that it "marks a new era in the history of Christianity." This is true, and he might well have said "a new and better era." On every side of us are the blessed evidences of the decline of sectarianism. The dry and lifeless bones of the old fighting theology will soon be buried quite out of sight. A few bitter and illiberal conservatives must pass away before the full light dawns, but this great non-sectarian Christian Council of 1908 prefigures that grand morning. All ministers of all denominations, and every one else who is interested in the progress of the Church of Christ, should send for this book and read its careful reports, discussions and speeches. Many of the latter are brilliant—all are full of the spirit of Christian unity and a noble determination to join hands with all good people for the redemption of our country from sin.

The New Sunday in the Navy

AFTER years of effort and agitation, victory has within the past few weeks crowned the efforts of those who have been working for more genuine observance of the Sabbath on the warships of the United States Navy. Tangible evidence that the longed-for goal has been reached is found in an order just issued by the Secretary of the Navy, specifying that henceforth all work aboard the nation's naval vessels shall be reduced on Sunday to the minimum consistent with the requirements of the service, to the end that the first day of every week may be observed as a day of rest. It is safe to say that no governmental order issued in years has been greeted with more enthusiastic approval by the thousands of bluejackets on the floating fortresses of Uncle Sam's sea patrol. A "free Sunday" is something that has long been dreamed of by the enlisted men of the sea service.

It should not be understood, from the welcome accorded the new order, that all observance of Sunday has heretofore been ignored on the naval craft under the Stars and Stripes. On the contrary, Sunday in the past has been marked on shipboard, as on shore, by a complete change of routine from the programme of the other days of the week. The point has been that, whereas many of the work-a-day duties of the bluejackets have been eliminated on Sunday morning, that time was chosen as a fitting occasion for more or less ceremonial events that occur on shipboard once each week, and the consequence was that while there was a change of occupation Jack was kept almost as steadily occupied on Sunday as on other days.

Conspicuous on the Sunday programme, under the old conditions, was the inspection of the ship and crew by the captain, attended by his executive officers and the other members of his staff. This is an elaborate and time-consuming function, and, while it is highly spectacular to onlookers, it is decidedly wearying for the tars and others on shipboard. Moreover, nobody can escape except in case of illness, for all hands—seamen, cooks, engine and fireroom force, marines, the ship's bandsmen, etc.—must participate. All this is now changed, and inspection as a Sunday morning ordeal is a thing of the past. Under the new order, ship inspection is to be held on any other day than Sunday that is most expedient, while inspection of the crew will take place on Saturday before noon, or as soon after the dinner hour as practicable.

The new Sunday programme in the Navy will allow more time for religious services, which in the future, as in the past, will be held each Sabbath morning on every ship where there is a chaplain. These services are usually held on the main deck, inside, where benches are arranged as seats for the officers and men who attend. Attendance is in no sense compulsory, and there is, consequently, no little significance in the fact that a very large proportion of the ship's company are usually present, especially if the chaplain be personally popular. And just here be it said that there is no better test of the personal magnetism and sincerity and earnestness of a clergyman than is to be found in the silent but readily discernible verdict rendered by the eight hundred lively, wholesome, healthy young men who make up the crew of a first-class battleship. Incidentally, it may be remarked that those misinformed persons who have gained the erroneous idea that the major portion of Uncle Sam's naval tars are rather a "hard lot," would be treated to a revelation if they could peep in on a naval religious service Sunday morning and witness the interest and enthusiasm with which the men of the sea take part in the service. Almost without exception, they join in the singing. In some instances the singing is to the accompaniment of an organ, while on other ships a powerful phonograph is made use of to carry the tune of the hymn.

By a great many of the bluejackets the extra leisure that will come to them on Sunday as the result of the new order will be used for reading and writing letters, this being Jack's best opportunity to write to loved ones ashore. However, there are not a few bluejackets who will take advantage of the added hours of liberty for special lines of religious work. The activities of the Y. M. C. A. and Christian Endeavor and Epworth League work have gained a strong hold in the Navy in recent years; but perhaps the most interesting exemplification of the trend of the times is found in the formation of Bible classes on many of the ships. The Bible class of the U. S. battleship Minnesota, the members of which are shown in the accompanying picture, constitutes an excellent example. This class, under the direction of Mr. J. Jacobsen, enrolls a number of young men who could be selected as ideal examples of the highest class of American men-o'-war's men.

In construction the rubber is built around a Fusible Metal Core in the shape of a bottle. The heat employed in the process of curing reduces the Fusible Core to liquid form, so that when the bottle is removed from the mould, the core may be poured from the mouth. As a result you have a hot water bottle of absolutely one piece of the very best Para rubber. No cemented seams or joints to give way under the action of hot water.

MAY BE COFFEE

That Causes all the Trouble

When the house is afire, it's like a body when disease begins to show, it's no time to talk but time to act—delay is dangerous—remove the cause of the trouble at once.

"For a number of years," says a Kansas lady, "I felt sure that coffee was hurting me, and yet, I was so fond of it, I could not give it up. I paltered with my appetite and of course yielded to the temptation to drink more. At last I got so bad that I made up my mind I must either quit the use of coffee or die.

"Everything I ate distressed me and I suffered severely almost all the time with palpitation of the heart. I frequently woke up in the night with the feeling that I was almost gone—my heart seemed so smoothered and weak in its action that I feared it would stop beating. My breath grew short and the least exertion set me to panting. I slept but little and suffered from rheumatism.

"Two years ago I stopped using the coffee and began to use Postum, and from the very first I began to improve. It worked a miracle! Now I can eat anything and digest it without trouble. I sleep like a baby, and my heart beats full, strong and easily. My breathing has become steady and normal, and my rheumatism has left me. I feel like another person, and it is all due to quitting coffee and using Postum, for I haven't used any medicine and none would have done any good as long as I kept drugging with coffee."

"There's a Reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Causes of Life Failures*

IT is sometimes said by the cynical that it does not make much difference what one does. If luck runs his way, he succeeds; if luck is against him, he fails.

Even Christians have been known to take this gloomy and fatalistic view of life. It is the true heathen view. Nearly all of the pagan religions imply it—and the more nearly our own convictions approach it, the more pagan we are.

For there is nothing in the teachings of our Saviour and his apostles upon which to base such a theory. As our daily readings for the week show, we are instructed by the good Book that diligence in business; energetic development of our talents; the practice of righteousness; persistence in the face of repeated trials and failures; the cultivation of strength and courage; and, perhaps, most important of all, the framing of a right ideal of success, are reasonably sure to secure it.

For it is the pattern by which we cut our garment, which, more than any other one element, determines its shape. You may be never so diligent, keen-witted, just to your fellow-men, persistent, strong and courageous; and yet, if you are pushing ahead on the wrong lines, you will fail of success.

Paul told Timothy to charge the rich with a sense of their responsibility. They were to remember that riches alone could not save them. They were to do righteousness, to be fruitful in good works, building a strong foundation for themselves, in order that they might lay hold on eternal life.

But in a pungent sermon, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton has just impressed it upon his people that not only the rich, but all of us, must feel that we have a mission to fulfil toward our brethren. We are not to say, "I am poor. It takes all that I can earn to support myself. Let the rich take care of the submerged tenth."

It is not money which the poor most need in our day. It is contact with high ideals; object lessons in neatness and proper living; kind and loving words. These the least prosperous of us can give; and unless we have given them as freely as in us lies we have not made a success of our lives.

The commercial ideal of success is considered to be the bane of our era; but it has been the bane of the world since the beginning of time. It is nothing new. In fact, it may be that there was never a time when it controlled so few minds as at present. The movement toward altruism surely was never so strong. Some one has said that in President Eliot's new scheme of worship, our neighbor, instead of the Deity, is made the God.

In many ways we of this generation are path-breakers. New thoughts, new ideals, new inventions bewilder us on every side. The earth is nearly explored. In a few years almost every inch of it will have been viewed by the eager human eye and trodden by the venturesome human foot, and we shall be reaching out to the planets and the suns; but the great ideal of success was shaped by our Saviour for all time, matchless and unchangeable. We believe that nearer and nearer the world is approaching to that ideal—so long misunderstood and but half imitated by his followers. You, the young and daring, "impatient, full of action, full of manly pride and friendship," must study it further and lead the world into greater light. It will come.

Not with the cushion and the slipper, not to the peaceful and the studious,
Not with riches safe and palling, not with tame enjoyment,
But with the diet hard and the blanket on the ground.

Thus men gain the great successes.

* Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, October 24. TEXT: Josh. 1 : 1-9.

The Lost Son*

WE can hardly realize what the Bible would be to us if the book of Luke were left out. The one parable of the prodigal son, recorded only there, has probably converted more souls than any other portion of Scripture of equal length. We are all sinners—and some of us may have erred so grievously that we feel all hope to be lost. Yet here we read of a man so degraded that he would fain have shared the food of the swine, yet forgiven, reinstated in his father's favor, made again into an honorable man, and with his past blotted out from remembrance. Surely Christ knew, as never did another, the human heart and its weaknesses and longings. He saw how, until the very millennium should dawn, the story of the prodigal would fit into men's needs, and would help to turn many to righteousness.

All ministers, and especially all evangelists, preach often upon this theme. There is nothing like it. Many of us have heard Mr. Moody as he used it to touch the hard hearts of the impenitent. Dr. Torrey, Mr. Chapman, Dr. Gray and hundreds of others, are using it over and over yearly—and never does it fail to impress with a magic power all those who hear. Simple though it be, perhaps no greater bit of fiction was ever invented, even by the Master himself.

It is the custom to deprecate the attitude of the elder brother; but instead much charity ought to be extended to him. No such celebration as was accorded to his erring brother had ever been given to him. He had been brought up to loathe the sins which the prodigal had committed. No doubt he had grieved over the heartbreak of his parents, as news had come to them from time to time of the "riotous living" of their darling youngest son. To see this wicked boy coming back and received as though he were a soldier returning from conquest, instead of a reprobate, who might be merely shamming his repentance in order to gain the chance for more revelry—well, it was a test of character such as few of us could probably endure.

And it really was not necessary, when one stops to think of it, that quite so much of ceremony should have attended the prodigal's return. One would think that a quiet, parental kiss, with the assurance of forgiveness, might have sufficed. But generations have praised God that in the parable those lifeless forms did not suffice, and that the warm, fatherly heart overflowed in such expressions as the festival robe, the ring and the banquet. Nothing less could have made the bad boy realize how deeply he had caused that father to suffer.

We do not know the later history of the prodigal son. Did he remain true to the father who so loved him? Or did he fall away and become again a wanderer? We believe that he kept faith to the end. But even if he did not reach the heights he might have won had he never fallen, his story has done ten thousand times the good that he himself could ever have done in person, though he had been faultless from the first. Sometimes the poets strike off the word which expresses a dramatic situation, better than any prose. You all remember Hezekiah Butterworth's little verses about the bird with the broken pinion, which was healed, but it "never soared so high again." Still it kept another from the snare. Such, at the very worst, was the life of the prodigal.

Paul Before Festus

By Mrs. M. Baxter

GOD'S ways are wonderful. The two years of Paul's detention at Cæsarea were not lost time. To outward appearance it might seem as though Satan had all his own way. The most successful missionary living, one who had turned the world upside down, was kept comparatively useless and idle. In reality God was teaching his honored servant to trust him.

Festus, although he left Paul bound in order that he might curry favor with the Jews, would not go the length of putting him into their power. He summoned them to appear against Paul for the second time; but, although they brought "many and grievous complaints against Paul," they could produce no proof of them, and thus he remained as before, uncondemned; and, led by the Holy Ghost, he appealed unto Cæsar. Still Festus was in a difficulty. He said to Paul, "Unto Cæsar shalt thou go"; but he had no real, authenticated charge to bring against him, and therefore when King Agrippa and his sister Bernice came to Cæsarea, he took the opportunity to speak of Paul's case and so interested Agrippa that he desired to hear Paul himself. To Paul every court of justice was just a congregation of needy immortal souls to whom he had a message from God. The man of God saw the king and his sister, both living lives notoriously unholy; he had to judge the great ones, but the miserable ones, of the earth. But he could see God in everything, and as soon as his turn came to speak he saw the glorious chance which God gave him to bear his name before kings. We have no reason to suppose that any time was given him to prepare for his trial. He had no counsel on his side and he yielded himself up to the Holy Ghost, who made his clear, open defense to be a powerful appeal to his hearers. Just what his enemies could not do, Paul did; he produced witnesses who could prove the truth of his statements; his witnesses were "all the Jews." Neither Agrippa nor Festus would have any difficulty in finding living witnesses of the truth of these statements of their prisoner. Then Paul went on to tell of how the Lord Jesus met him in the way and how he had received his mission. Part of Paul's mission was to open the eyes of the very men who sat in judgment on him. At that moment he had a divine commission to turn Festus, Agrippa and Bernice from darkness to light and from Satan to God.

Festus, the man of the world, could not but see that if Paul were not acting as a madman, he himself was; and he preferred rather to count Paul mad than himself. "Paul," he said, "thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad." But Paul said, "I am not mad, most noble Festus: but speak forth the words of truth and soberness. For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely; for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner." Then turning right on the king he put a question to him, just as one would put to an anxious soul: "King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest." Paul had just testified that he taught none other things than "the prophets and Moses did say should come." If Agrippa believed the prophets, how could he not believe Christ? But this involved so much: he must repent or change his mind, "turn to God," and leave off sin. By this his popularity would be lost, he must leave his great pomp, and be a despised, persecuted follower of Jesus; but with sin forgiven, the power of Satan broken, his soul saved, an eternity of joy before him. The balance trembled, it turned slowly but surely on the wrong side. "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." The die was cast; salvation slipped from him; he retained his position, his pomp, and his sins.

A Book of Facts About 6% Irrigation Bonds

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds, based on 15 years of experience. It is a conservative statement of the vital facts of which we have intimate knowledge.

It will give you a clear conception of these ideal securities, which are now the most popular bonds that we handle.

Every investor, small or large, owes to himself a knowledge of these facts. Please send for the book—it is free.

An Unbiased Book

We are very large dealers in all good classes of bonds—Municipal, Corporation and Public Utility. We can offer you the choice of scores of such issues, and we just as gladly supply them as we do Irrigation bonds. So our position is not at all biased.

But Irrigation bonds have in late years become the most popular bonds that we handle. They are becoming more popular as they become better known. The reasons mean much to every investor, and they are all told in this book.

71 Issues Sold

In the past 15 years we have sold 71 separate issues of Reclamation bonds—Drainage and Irrigation—without a dollar of loss to any investor. We are now the largest dealers in this class of bonds, so our book is based on ample experience.

We buy and sell Entire Issues of Reclamation bonds. Our own engineers and attorneys pass on every detail. An officer of our Company spends most of his time in the irrigated country, watching every project through to completion.

Being the largest dealers in Irrigation bonds, we have our pick of the issues. There are few projects of this kind, save Government projects, which we are not invited to finance. We are able, therefore, to supply our customers with the best of these securities, all based on well-located lands.

Farm Lien Security

Irrigation bonds are secured by first liens on the most fertile farm lands in America. The liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. And the water immediately multiplies the land's value.

The liens are conservative. Usually they will not exceed one-fourth the land's value. The liens are paid off in ten annual installments.

The first crop from the land is frequently sufficient to pay the whole lien—often by several times over. These liens, therefore, have many advantages over the usual farm mortgage.

In addition, the bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns, and which the proceeds of the bonds help to build and buy.

Some Irrigation bonds are municipal securities, issued by organized districts. Such bonds, like School bonds, form a tax lien on all the real property lying in populous districts.

Some Irrigation bonds are issued under all the provisions of the Federal law known as the "Carey Act."

In all the projects we finance the security is ample and ideal. One can scarcely conceive of anything better.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent. interest. This is a larger rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

This high rate is due to the fact that irrigation projects are profitable. The demand for irrigated land exceeds the supply. Many millions of dollars can be utilized at once in these projects, and this liberal rate is paid to obtain the funds.

$100—$500—$1,000

These are serial bonds, running from two to twelve years. So one may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

The bonds are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

Our book deals with all these facts—and more. It is profusely illustrated. Every investor owes to himself its perusal. Please send this coupon to-day for it.

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

C. W. L., Binghamton, N. Y. To what extent has recent legislation in France affected the actual use of churches and church property in France by Catholic congregations formerly using them?

This question has been referred to the editor of the Courrier des Etats Unis, New York City, who courteously supplies the following information: "The churches have, for the most part, been turned over to the municipalities for the use of the parish priests. The rectories are rented, or given free of rent, to the priests, according to the wishes of said municipalities. The bishops' palaces, the property of the State since 1791, have been taken from the bishops, who now have to provide for themselves. All schools opened by the clergy have been taken over by the State. According to the new legislation, the clergy, Catholic or Protestant, cannot own church property."

R. S., Thayer, Kan. 1. Where can I get information concerning the "sweat-shops" and their methods of working? 2. Which is the greater cause of poverty among the working classes, low wages or lack of thrift?

1. Write to Scribners, New York, for Jacob Riis' book on the subject. 2. Both are contributory causes, the latter probably the greater of the two; but we might add drink, frequent strikes, high rents and the steadily rising cost of food and clothing.

Mrs. L. A. M., Climax, Mich. 1. In the 25th chapter of Matthew are the words "eternal" and "everlasting" translated from the same word? 2. Was the King James Version translated from the Greek and Latin?

1. Yes, it is rendered "eternal" in the Revised edition. 2. From both, and also from the Hebrew. They had all the original sources available at that time, although many important documents older than they possessed have come to light since, and were accessible to the translators of the Revised edition.

Mrs. R. B. G., Milford, Mass. Some weeks ago you told of the capture of hundreds of women and girls by the cruel Kurds, and how some wives begged their husbands to kill them rather than to suffer such a fate. Now, I ask, has no effort been made to rescue these poor women, when the whole country was aroused to rescue Ellen Stone? It is a terrible thought. You solicited money with which to continue the lives of poor Armenians, when death would be preferable when such a fate awaits them! Why do Christian lands remain oblivious, and why do not the great missionary societies make some arrangements whereby these poor people can be transported? Thousands of homes would be opened to these girls if they were to be brought to America. We have a bright Armenian girl living near us, who has married and keeps house here, coming from the mission school before the massacre.

Letters from Adana and Tarsus assure us that, for a time at least, the troubles are over. An official investigation has taken place, the women have been restored to their homes, and a few Turks have been punished. There are hopes of happier days for Armenia under the new regime. This hope, slender though it may be, will keep most of the Armenians at home. It is their native land, and, with the new prospect of peace before them, they are not likely to leave it.

W. H. H., Gastonia, N. C. Please give me the name of the author of the quotation "What fools we mortals be."

Shakespeare, in A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Mrs. G. C., Markham. Kindly explain Luke 16:9?

There is a great improvement in the translation in the Revised Version, which gives the passage thus, "Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness, that, when it shall fail, they may receive you into the eternal tabernacles." The word "mammon" stands for those riches which the world idolizes, and which many abuse; and the injunction is to turn to your highest advantage and to the best uses those riches with the same sagacious foresight which the unjust steward displayed, only applied in the right direction. Use it for making friends and serving good purposes, so that when money fails you, or is spent, you may have the satisfaction of knowing that you have made abiding friendships while you had the opportunity. The phrase, "into everlasting habitations," might with justice be rendered "into lasting habitations," or "more enduring habitations" than this steward was welcomed into, when he was turned out of doors. A further meaning might be found in the fact that those friends we have made would stand as our witnesses for Jesus' sake, and our acts of beneficence on their behalf would plead for us in the judgment.

S. H. M., Chippewa Falls, Wis. If a man desert his wife and helpless children, and lead a life of ease and pleasure, free from responsibility, would it be right and a Christian act to force him by law to provide for these helpless little ones?

Certainly, he can be compelled by law to provide support. See I. Tim. 5:8, which shows the Scripture attitude in such cases.

J. D., Highland, Ill. Is the mystery spoken of in Rev. 10:7 the same as the one spoken of in I. Cor. 15:51?

The "mystery" here spoken of is the mystery of redemption, once hidden in God's secret counsels, and shadowed forth in types and prophecies, but now clearly revealed, to the joy of his servants, who will praise him for the glorious consummation in taking to himself the kingdom so long usurped by Satan and the wicked. The "mystery of God" is the Gospel. It is not to be confused with the passage in I. Corinthians, which explains itself.

E., La Salle, Mich. 1. Are there any Jews who now speak the Hebrew language? 2. Do the Jews have a secret language? 3. What is the Yiddish language? 4. Will pure water, if put under a microscope, show life, or moving animals, in it?

1. Yes, many, but hardly a majority. 2. They have a dialectic language called the Yiddish, but we know of no secret language they use that cannot be understood. 3. The Yiddish is not a language, but a jargon, used by the uneducated Jews. 4. Yes, we should say all water will show a minute insect life under the microscope, unless it has been boiled, distilled or sterilized.

N. B. G., Harrison, Me. Please give an exact description of "The Lion of Lucerne."

The model for the Lion of Lucerne was made by Thorwaldsen. It is hewn out of the solid rock. It was cut in honor of the brave Swiss Guards of King Louis XVI. of France. At the outbreak of the French Revolution they were stationed at the palace of the Tuileries, in Paris. On August 10, 1792, while gallantly defending the King, they were overpowered by the Paris mob and killed to the last man. The lion is wounded apparently, and leans despondently over the tablet on which the event is recorded.

N. R. R., Milford, Tex. 1. Who is the author of "Of all sad words of tongue or pen, the saddest are these, 'It might have been'"? 2. Why does the Dead Sea continue to be so salty, when the fresh waters of the Jordan have been pouring into it for ages? 3. Please explain Luke 7:28.

1. Whittier, in "Maud Muller." 2. Because it has no outlet, and the waters from the Jordan quickly evaporate, leaving the sea nearly always at the same height, and its waters salt and bitter. 3. This is interpreted to mean that John, though great as a prophet, was the last of the old school, and was eclipsed by the New Dispensation of grace, the humblest of whose disciples had greater advantages than he. The comparison has no reference to personal character, but simply to spiritual privileges.

Mrs. C. D. B., Gallipolis, O. 1. Is Crete a possession of Greece, or have European Powers sovereignty over it? 2. What is the correct pronunciation of Peary?

1. Crete is still under the nominal sovereignty of Turkey, though the hold of the Ottoman authorities has been badly shaken. The people are probably of even purer Greek blood than those on the mainland, and undouhtedly within a short time some arrangement will be made whereby they become a part of the kingdom of Greece. 2. "Peery" is as near as one can get to the pronunciation of Peary in writing.

L. H., St. Louis, Mo. 1. Please explain the belief of Theosophists. How does it differ from the Christian belief? 2. Does the name "McDowell" denote Scotch or Irish origin?

1. It is a mystical system of philosophy, which claims to investigate the mysterious laws of nature and the occult forces, and its votaries claim to have illuminations, visions and special revelations, which give them knowledge of heavenly things. It has nothing in common with the Christian belief. Theosophists believe the essential divinity is in man; that there is a unity of consciousness throughout the universe, and that an infinite, eternal, immutable principle underlies all things. 2. McDowell is one of the most ancient of Scotch names. The McDowells were a powerful tribe in Galloway. The present chief, McDowell of Garthland, has his residence in Renfrewshire. There are doubtless some of the name in the north part of Ireland, as it was settled by people from the southwest of Scotland in the reign of James VI.

President Taft Opening the Great Gunnison Tunnel, September 23

ONE of the most noteworthy events of President Taft's Western tour occurred when he stopped for a short time at Montrose, Colo., and pressed the metal plate which opened the flood-gates of the great Gunnison Tunnel. The water which will flow through the tunnel will, it is expected, make the Uncompahgre Valley blossom like the rose. It is the largest irrigation project yet completed under government supervision and cost $4,000,000. The tunnel was cut through a mountain of granite for six miles. People on the other side of the mountain waited for the water to appear. It came with a roar and as it entered the canal they broke into a hearty cheer.

Mrs. O. S. H., Lehanon, Ky. 1. The clause "He descended into hell" is not found in any creed before the fourth century, and it was not used in the church before that time. Good authorities state that it was first inserted in the creed of Aquileia. The earlier Roman and Oriental churches, before that time, simply held that the words "He descended into hades" were equivalent to "the grave." The passage I. Pet. 3:18-20 is held by many to explain the cause of the descent. Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Clement, Tertullian, the Gnostics and the Ante-Nicene fathers generally held the doctrine that He descended into hades to announce to the souls of the patriarchs and others the accomplishment of the work of redemption. The whole matter has been the subject of endless controversy.

THE CELEBRATION AT OLD YORKTOWN

By MRS. D. R. CRAIG

AT Yorktown, immortalized by the surrender of Lord Cornwallis in 1781 to Washington, a large assembly of visitors, especially school children, participate in special exercises during the third week of the present month to commemorate the valor and victory which achieved American independence. No place could have been more wisely chosen, for this quaint town is a relic of past generations, sleeping amid the environments of bygone days, content with honors won.

The Yorktown Historical Society, composed of patriotic citizens, noting the increasing interest and pride in the earliest American history, is seeking to preserve those sites which possess intrinsic value as true object lessons to every student of Colonial life about the famous town.

Picturesquely located upon a high bluff, Yorktown overlooks the broad York River, a tributary of the Chesapeake. Time was when its first settlers, appreciating this most excellent harbor, "hoped to make Yorktown the metropolis of the New World." To-day a thrice weekly steamer is the only link that connects this port with the world's traffic.

Following the path from the water front, we reach the main street of the village. On either side we see some quaint ruin or structure that is important in the annals of Revolutionary days.

Here we see the old court house, and the English-built tavern remains unchanged in its exterior; beautiful old homes stand here and there beside the pathetic destruction of other brick foundations, showing the havoc of three wars.

The few residences that remain show the classic taste of their first owners, and it is easy to dream amid this atmosphere of a time when hospitality was dispensed to friends, "the ladies and gentlemen who came into York port to await the arrival of the ship's cargo from England." The first custom house in the United States is the most venerable relic of the town. Built before 1715, when New York and Philadelphia were in their infancy, all goods were imported through this custom house.

The Nelson House is the most frequently visited place in Yorktown. It was the home of Major-General Nelson of the American Army.

In the siege of 1781 Lord Cornwallis occupied the Nelson House as headquarters. It is related that the American gunners hesitated to bombard the home of their gallant officer. Instantly noting their hesitation, Nelson called to them, "Spare no particle of my property so long as it affords shelter to the enemies of my country." Although the house was struck in many places it was repaired, and posterity to-day views a cannon ball lodged in its wall. In deference to the strong friendship existing in war time between General Lafayette and Major-General Nelson, the American nation accorded the family of Nelson the honor of entertaining the nation's guest. The room occupied by Lafayette is pointed out, and before the door of his host's home the noble French general planted the tree which is yet standing.

Known as the "little Nelson House," but yet a spacious Colonial mansion, is a companion structure to the famous building, having been built in 1699 upon the adjoining lot to Nelson's home.

Congress in 1879 appropriated $100,000 as the nation's gift to erect the Yorktown monument to commemorate the victory by which the independence of America was achieved. The monument is 95½ feet high and covers an area of 945½ square feet. The genius of three artists, Hunt, Ward and Van Brunt, designed it. It is magnificent in conception, conveying the idea of the completed victory and fruits of peace for America.

The monument is adorned by thirteen figures, representing joy in union as Colonies, symbolizing the birth of Freedom. The column notes the advance and prosperity of the nation, bearing the stars of the States which numbered thirty-eight at the time of its erection; on the shaft is a shield of Yorktown covering the branch of Peace. Adorning the pinnacle stands the majestic figure of the Goddess of Peace. In the absence of President Taft on his Western tour, Governor Hughes of New York was extended an invitation to participate in the programme of patriotic exercises. During the week the time-honored Grace Church, built before 1712, opened its doors to hold service. Rev. George Washington Dame, of Baltimore Episcopal Diocese, addressed descendants of the patriots. The school children, dressed in white, assembled around the immense enclosure of the monument and sang patriotic songs.

Later, a visit to ancient Moore House, a mile distant upon Temple Farm, where the famous articles of capitulation were drawn up and signed, could not fail to make memorable impress upon every visitor, as the proudest moment in the life of Washington, when within these walls the terms of surrender were finally considered by that distinguished coterie of American, French and English officers. During the Centennial of 1881 Moore House had the honor of entertaining as American guests the descendants of Lafayette, Rochambeau and Von Steuben.

Obscure in location, yet of all spots the most hallowed, is the site on which Cornwallis surrendered.

A SERMON BY

THE TIME OF HARVEST
TEXT—Gen. 8:22
"While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest . . . shall not cease."

SUCH was part of the promise God made to Noah, on his building an altar to the Lord, on his offering a sacrifice of thanksgiving for a late mercy graciously vouchsafed to him. The mercy referred to was Noah's wonderful preservation—the safe keeping of himself and family while the whole world beside perished in the waters. The account of that terrible visitation is a most remarkable one; remarkable for its almost utter silence as regards those who died, while it relates with astonishing minuteness every circumstance connected with those who survived.

"And all flesh died." This is the sum and substance of all we are told of those who perished. Not a word of their bitter cries or loud lamentations; not a word of the paralyzing amazement which must have seized them, as they beheld the waters rolling onward, and prevailing exceedingly; while of Noah we are told not only of the day when he entered the ark, but of the day when the rain ceased; how God remembered him, and the fountains of the great deep were stopped; how, when the waters were dried up from off the earth, "God spake unto Noah, saying, Go forth of the ark, thou, and thy wife, and thy sons, and thy sons' wives with thee." And why this difference, but to teach us that our God is most careful to remember the righteous and pours down his mercies upon them? It was when He who had shut the ark had opened it again, when he who first bade the patriarch enter it now bade him go free—it was then that Noah gathered around him all his family, and "builded an altar unto the Lord," and offered a burnt offering. And it was then "the Lord smelled a sweet savor," and "said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; neither will I again smite any more every living thing, as I have done. While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest shall not cease."

God's Promise to Noah

How many thoughts crowd upon the mind at the mention of harvest! Taken in connection with this promise of our text, it is a remembrancer for God—a reminder of his faithfulness. Again, the harvest prefigures, as it were, the end of the world. "The harvest," said our Lord on one occasion, "is the end of the world." And, lastly, it is a time of rest—a time of recompense and a time of rejoicing.

Thousands of years have elapsed since God thus spake to Noah. Generations on generations have all passed away; yet it is as true now as then, that God hath "appointed the moon for certain seasons, and the sun knoweth his going down." How it seems to confirm the word, "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass away than for one tittle of the law to fail." The return of harvest speaks to us in language not to be mistaken. "Hold fast the profession of your faith without wavering; for he is faithful that has promised." "My covenant will I not break, saith the Lord; nor alter the thing that has gone out of my lips." This ripening of the grain, this putting in of the sickle, this gathering into barns—how it all proclaims that "the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but his kindness shall not depart for them that trust him." "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." "The Lord is faithful, who will establish you and keep you from evil." Nothing can stand in the way of God's faithfulness; "for he hath commanded his covenant forever."

His Wonderful Mercies

"But," you will say, perhaps, "it is not God's faithfulness I question; I doubt his mercy. The Word of the Lord, that shall stand; but his mercy is in the heavens. It reacheth not to me." And why not? Mercy! That is God's precious and darling attribute. It is through mercy especially that he is pleased to reveal himself to man—it is the name by which he chooses to be called: "the Lord God merciful and gracious." What but mercy, infinite mercy, so prevailed with the Almighty that he should promise "seed-time and harvest" so long as the earth endureth? Was man's heart at all improved by the waters of the Deluge? Was it not still as fully as before set on evil? And was the Lord unconscious of this? It was the Lord himself who said that the "imaginations of man's heart" were still only "evil from his youth." And yet he promised that "seed-time and harvest should not cease." God's promise is yet being fulfilled—the harvest yet returns at the appointed season, a marvelous testimony to the unchangeableness of God's mercy. "Behold," said he, when revealing himself to Jacob—and thus he speaks in the harvest to every believer, to every prayerful and wrestling soul, even though weak and infirm and torn by inward conflict—"behold, I am with thee; and I will keep thee in all places whithersoever thou goest; and I will not leave thee, until I have performed that which I have spoken."

The Harvest a Type

Further, the harvest is a figure of the consummation of all things. "And the harvest," said the Lord, in his famous parable of the tares, "is the end of the world."

"The end of the world!" How little it is considered! What mighty interests, what weighty concerns will be wound up for weal or woe when that shall come—"the end of the world." That it will come is certain. It is as sure as the harvest. It forms part of God's covenant engagement, here revealed to us in the text. It is not expressed in so many words, but it is as plainly implied. "While the earth remaineth," we read. Surely in this "while" we have a clear and distinct intimation of what is elsewhere broadly stated, that "these heavens and this earth shall flee away, and there shall be found no place for them"—that "the day of the Lord cometh, in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up."

But referring to the parable of the tares, we find it was in respect of one particular only that our blessed Lord spake of the harvest as a figure of the end of the world, namely, the separation of the righteous from the wicked. He there compares the "kingdom of heaven," or, in other words, the Church on earth, to "a man who sowed good seed in his field," but in the night time "his enemy came and sowed tares." His servants discovered the injury, and they entreated permission to root up the tares. "But he said, Nay; lest ye root up the wheat also. Let both grow together unto the harvest: and in the time of harvest, I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them; but gather the wheat into my barn." Afterward our Lord explains the parable: "The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom, but the tares are the children of the wicked one. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of the world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire."

Putting in the Sickle

Well may the worldling put far away from him all thoughts of scenes like these. Well may he strive to forget they ever can be, "for the day of the Lord is great and very terrible; who can abide it?" Strive as he may, he will yet one day hear the cry, "Thrust in the sickle and reap, for the time is come, for the harvest of the earth is ripe." Then the reapers, the angels of God, shall go forth and sever the wicked from among the just. Now, the wheat and the tares are growing together in the same field, but then we shall "discern between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not." "Every plant our heavenly Father has not planted will then be rooted out." And as in harvest the reapers cast aside the weed whose rank, luxuriant growth choked the fair crop around, so every false professor will be "cast into outer darkness," while the "righteous will shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father."

Again, it is in the harvest we receive of that we have sown, and we then see the end of the husbandman's labor—why he has so long "waited for the early and latter rain." And so in the end of the world. Then we shall see the purposes for which the world was made, and wherefore it has been sustained so long. Then shall the "trumpet sound, and the dead shall be raised." Remember how the prophet spoke, while lamenting the wilful impenitence of Jerusalem: "The harvest is passed and the summer is ended, and we are not saved." The harvest of our natural world is past. The golden grain has been gathered in. Already the leaves of autumn begin to fall around us; soon all nature will assume a dreary and a desolate appearance. How this reminds us that our season of opportunity is passing rapidly away! that yet a little while, and if we have not reaped the rich harvest of Christ's atoning merit—if we have had no ingathering of God's sanctifying Spirit, if we have secured no right or title to the mansions eternal—then what awaits us but a long and endless winter of indignation and wrath? "We are not saved."

But the harvest is also a time of rest, a time of recompense, a time of rejoicing. The husbandman's toil is over. His waiting is done. His careful watching, his early rising, and his late retiring—all are ended. His fruits and grain are all safely housed. No cutting winds, no pelting rains, no howling storms disturb him now. He resigns himself to rest. He may long have labored, but all will be over then. He may have toiled here below, "in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses," but "thenceforward he will know them no more forever." Redeemed by the blood of Christ, and sanctified by God's free Spirit, he will enter there, where "nothing that defileth can ever come," where privations and sorrows, anxieties, weariness and fatigue are unknown, where they "shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more."

The Husbandman's Reward

But the harvest is also a time of recompense. The husbandman then receives his reward for all his toil. The labors of former days are then fully and amply compensated. He receives the rich fruits of increase. And the end of the world, the consummation of all things, is man's retribution day. Then the Christian receives the end of his faith, the salvation of his soul. His reproaches, and services, and sufferings for Christ's sake will then be fully rewarded. He will then find a more than recompense for all; he will see the desire of his soul, and will sit down satisfied.

Finally, the harvest is the time of rejoicing. "They joy before me," says the Scripture, "according to the joy of harvest." We are told of a certain rich man, "whose ground brought forth plentifully," that when he had pulled down his barns and built greater, and had bestowed in them his fruits, he said to his soul, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry." How much more shall they rejoice who are rich toward God? In the great day of the Lord's appearing they will look up and rejoice—rejoice to behold their Redeemer "coming in the clouds of heaven, and all the holy angels with him." They will then rejoice, for their enemy will be made their footstool. The doors of heaven will then be thrown wide open for their entry, and they will go into "the city of the living God," and "everlasting joy shall be upon their heads," and "they shall reign with Christ forever."

As We Sow, We Reap

But the text speaks a word of warning. Just as we have had the harvest of the fruits of the earth, so, having had the seed-time and the summer of ample opportunity, we shall have the autumn for reaping the fruit of our doings. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." He that soweth to the wind shall reap the whirlwind; and "he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption," while "he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." Let us not then be weary in well doing; for "in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." Let us see that we are ever found in Christ, and living to Christ. When the end comes, we shall reap an abundant harvest in the joy of the Lord. Richly will it repay us then for all our self-denial here, when he shall say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

A LAND OF FIESTAS AND IDOLS

Fruit Seller

A Public Market in Guatemala

Rapid Transit in Central America

Water Carrier

By NEVIN O. WINTER

Author of "Guatemala and Her People To-day"

THAT the early races who inhabited Central America were a religious people is shown by the ruins which still exist. The race that occupied Guatemala is supposed to have been the original Toltecs, and it is claimed that they had only one god, and did not indulge in human sacrifices until their intercourse with the Aztecs of Mexico. In their later history, they did indulge in those horrible practices and also resorted to cannibalism. This was the condition when the Spaniards came.

The inhabitants were rapidly baptized by the priests who accompanied the Spanish invaders. One priest wrote that "an ordinary days' work is from ten to twenty thousand souls." In the course of a few years, practically the whole population of Central America had been brought within the fold of the Catholic Church by baptism. It is not surprising that converts, adopted with such undue haste and neither instructed in the truths of the new faith nor taught the absurdities of the old belief, mingled in hopeless confusion their veneration for the old superstition and their slender knowledge of the new Christianity. They might be able to make the sign of the cross and yet not know what that symbol meant to humanity.

These vague and hazy sentiments have not been thoroughly eradicated after four centuries of the work of ecclesiastics. New ceremonies and symbols were substituted for the old, and the saints took the place of the former idols as visible objects of worship. Religious fiestas, of which there are now about two hundred each year, and processions were established to attract and hold the natives to the new worship. In fact, Christianity was itself somewhat paganized. Many of the religious ceremonies are performed even to this day with a most lamentable indifference and want of decorum. Some of the celebrations in the churches in the more remote districts include dances of the most grotesque description, being as near as possible to the old rites of the natives. The priests justify these ceremonies by saying that it is necessary in order to hold the Indians in the church. "It is well to preserve them," they say, "only taking care that they do not degenerate into orgies."

The simple natives will attend the churches to-day and kneel before the sacred images while making their prayers, and then go and consult their old wizard, and follow whatever his instructions may be. The old and the new superstitions are so confused in their minds that they want to be on the safe side by following both. In some places, an incense made of gum copal is burned before the altars, which is the identical incense used in their old idol worship. The impressive services of the Roman church, the chanting, the solemn music attract the Indian, but at heart he is still an idolater. The wizards, who are always old men, are much feared and they practice a strange mixture of fire and devil worship.

During the first century and a half of Spanish rule hundreds of churches were built throughout Central America. It became a pious duty for returning Spaniards to bring paintings and statues of saints, and holy relics of saints, to place in these newly-erected edifices. Now most of them are in a badly preserved condition, and the churches have a neglected appearance. Even bats make their abode in some of the structures devoted to the worship of God. There are many old, crude organs still in use, in which the wind is supplied by a bellows, much the same as the blacksmith uses for his fires. As if this were not enough, native instruments, including a drum made of hides stretched over the hollow trunks of trees, are used, and bombs and rockets are let off to add to the confusion and make a deeper impression on the mind of the poor Indian.

The most absurd paintings and statues are used to portray sacred characters. In one place God is represented as a man with a bald head and white beard. One figure of Christ represents him as a shaven monk, and another with glass eyes, long human hair and a crown perched above his left eye. At one place is a picture of the people lassoing Christ and in another is a painting showing a priest offering a consecrated wafer to a kneeling ass.

On December 8 is celebrated the feast of the Immaculate Conception. On this public holiday religious processions march over the principal streets of the cities. Women dress up as "devils" and animals, and dance before the images of the Virgin—large dolls, covered with lace and tinsel. Rockets are fired, and candles burned in nearly every window.

It is little wonder that men of the Creole class seldom attend the services. Bringing down the Christian worship to such a low level cannot do otherwise than alienate one who thinks for himself.

The majority of the men simply stand by, without interfering with the services; but at heart they are almost atheistic, and it is little wonder. Several Catholic writers have been the most severe critics of the religious conditions existing in many parts of Spanish America.

Protestantism has scarcely made an imprint in Central America. The Presbyterian Church maintains a couple of missionaries in Guatemala. The Wesleyan Methodist ministers living in Belize, British Honduras, hold occasional services in Puerto Barrios, Guatemala, and in Puerto Cortez and San Pedro Sula, Honduras. Protestant services are held in one or two places in Costa Rica, and that is about the extent of Protestant mission work in Central America, not including Panama. The American Bible Society has an agent in Guatemala City also.

There is a broad field for mission work among the four million people living in the five Central American republics. The medical missionary will probably accomplish the best results; for good physicians are few, and the native people are so poor that they cannot afford to pay for their services. A lack of hygiene is prevalent everywhere, and the people are ignorant of the ordinary sanitary measures which would lessen sickness and suffering to a great degree. A moral awakening is needed also, and the field is ripe for such a movement.

I am very, very grateful to these dear ones for all help given."

—REV. EGERTON R. YOUNG, the well-known missionary and lecturer of "Canoe and Dog Train" fame, is lying very ill at his home, Algonquin Lodge, Bradford, Ontario. He is suffering from dangerous intestinal trouble. Mr. Young for a number of years has been an occasional and valued contributor to the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—TWO LADY TEACHERS are wanted for the intermediate and primary departments of the Glen Alpine Springs School, Morganton, N. C., R. F. D. No. 1. This school offers an opportunity of securing an education to white boys and girls who cannot afford the regular schools. Its pupils come from the mountains and valleys. A good opportunity is afforded to those interested in mission work. Address R. D. Schoonmaker, 1003 Park Avenue, Plainfield, N. J.

—MISSIONARY JAMES MURRAY, of the West China Religious Tract Society, writes from Chungking: "I have just returned from a five weeks' tour in the west of China, on which I visited eighteen walled cities and a large number of market towns. I was made welcome to enter the many schools, and permitted to speak to the students. The temples, too, were, by the permission of the Buddhist priests, made use of to hold Christian services in. Never before was the door of China so open for the reception of the Gospel. In that short five weeks 109 New Testaments, 3,491 Gospels and several thousand Christian tracts were sold and distributed. The West China Religious Tract Society publishes Christian books and tracts in Chinese, in Tibetan and in the Miao language, and places these books in the hands of the people of West China and Tibet. The field we serve is a large one, including the four western provinces of China and Tibet, with a population of one hundred million souls—greater than the entire population of the United States. We ask for the prayers of God's people and also for practical help."

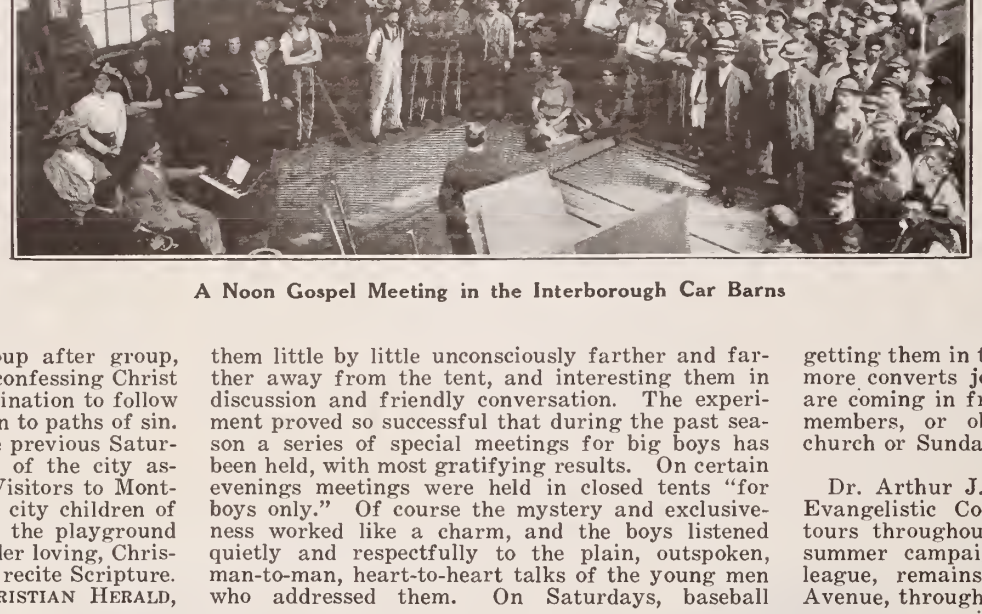
THE GOSPEL IN MANY TONGUES

TO mark the close of the fifth season of the Tent, Open-air and Shop Campaign conducted by the Evangelistic Committee of New York City, a mass meeting was held in Carnegie Hall on the evening of September 13. The great auditorium was packed with those interested in the work. Five hundred young people formed a volunteer choir, with Professor Butts as director. An interesting feature of the evening's programme was the one-minute talk given by each of the evangelists and leaders. Some spoke in Italian, others in Swedish, Spanish, and other tongues. Rev. Charles L. Goodell, chairman of the committee, presided and reviewed the work of the committee, with its broad scope, its definite aim and its peculiar and varied composition.

A living testimony to the success of the efforts put forth was seen in the hundreds of men and women who filled the entire floor of the great building, converts of the work of the committee. Men and women of many nationalities; men bronzed from outdoor labor, women bent from domestic drudgery, faces marked with lines of dissipation; figures spare and stamped with poverty's cruel hall-mark; others of thriftier condition, with a fair representation of the well-to-do middle classes of a great city. Redeemed 'longshoremen, saloon-keepers, blasphemers, boys from the streets, men from the shops; young and old, black and white, native and foreign born, prosperous and struggling with the hardships of the unemployed; all stood, group after group, from the various centres, happy in confessing Christ and declaring publicly their determination to follow their Saviour and never more return to paths of sin.

The children had their day on the previous Saturday, when 2,300 from all sections of the city assembled for a parade and rally. Visitors to Mont-Lawn know how wonderfully these city children of foreign parentage, picked up from the playground of the summer street and placed under loving, Christian teachers, can learn to sing and recite Scripture. Through the courtesy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the song sheets used at Mont-Lawn were used by the children in the tents this year, and sung with enthusiasm and joy.

A new feature of the campaign has been a special department for "big boys"; those who have reached the age when they consider themselves no longer children, nor even mere boys, but big boys, with a capital "B." Such lads have usually formed a disturbing element at the opening of the tents each season. Last year, an attempt was made to engage the disturbers in a meeting of their own, drawing them little by little unconsciously farther and farther away from the tent, and interesting them in discussion and friendly conversation. The experiment proved so successful that during the past season a series of special meetings for big boys has been held, with most gratifying results. On certain evenings meetings were held in closed tents "for boys only." Of course the mystery and exclusiveness worked like a charm, and the boys listened quietly and respectfully to the plain, outspoken, man-to-man, heart-to-heart talks of the young men who addressed them. On Saturdays, baseball games and other sports were planned by the student workers of the tent, and at the conclusion of the games an evangelistic service was held, followed sometimes by lemonade or ice-cream. At the close of the season, a field meet was held on one of the city's athletic fields. Nearly five hundred boys participated in the sports; boys from Little Italy, the Ghetto, "Hell's Kitchen," the Battery, Harlem and the Bronx. Yet among all this throng of some of the roughest boys of the city not one serious quarrel or any approach to a "fight" occurred.



A Noon Gospel Meeting in the Interborough Car Barns

During the past summer the committee conducted work at ten tent centres, in four halls, at eighteen open-air centres and in twenty-five shops, besides half a dozen centres where Brotherhoods and Young People's Societies held outdoor meetings in co-operation with the committee. Services were held in English, Italian and Spanish. In addition to the work among Finns and Swedes, begun last year, a new work has been established among Hungarian - Bohemian - Slovak people and services for Poles and Jews. Good attendance and earnest, respectful attention characterized the meetings wherever held, and inquirers are being led to Christ and into the church.

The summer campaign has been carried on at an expense of $26,000. The committee are hopeful that $3,000 more might be contributed to the "follow-up work" during the winter, calling on converts, locating signers of decision cards, and getting them in touch with the churches. Each year more converts join the churches. Already reports are coming in from pastors who are receiving new members, or observing increased attendance at church or Sunday School.

Dr. Arthur J. Smith, the superintendent of the Evangelistic Committee, resumes his evangelistic tours throughout the country at the close of the summer campaign. Mr. Orin C. Baker, his colleague, remains at headquarters, 541 Lexington Avenue, throughout the year. M. K. H.

Just south of the wall enclosing the spacious grounds of the National Cemetery a simple shaft, less than twenty-two feet high, has been placed. The monument was dedicated October 19, 1895, to the school children of the United States.

The legendary cave where Cornwallis is said to have sought refuge from his enemies is shown to every visitor; originally, perhaps, this cave was used as a smugglers' cave.

It is an interesting fact about the surrender of the English army that Cornwallis himself was not present, and sent a deputy to act for him, and that General Lincoln, through the courtesy of Washington, received the sword, instead of the American commander in chief. The capitulation was signed on October 18, and on the day following it was arranged that the English should march out of the Yorktown defenses.

Where Cornwallis Surrendered

At two o'clock on the afternoon of the 19th the American Army and their French allies formed in two lines, on either side of the road, some distance from the outworks. The double ranks extended for over a mile. Washington here showed a fine sense of delicacy, and his respect for a defeated foe. He ordered every spectator from the vicinity, and no soldier in the American ranks was to exhibit the least sign of exultation.

The English marched down to the spot where Washington and his staff headed the American line. General O'Hara was in command of the English forces. He rode up to Washington, raised his hat and apologized for the absence of Cornwallis, who, he said, was ill. O'Hara then offered his sword. Washington declined it politely, and designated General Lincoln to receive it. General Lincoln the year previous had been compelled by the fortunes of war to surrender to Sir Henry Clinton at Charleston.

General Lincoln at once returned the sword to General O'Hara, after taking it by the hilt, and then, taking command of the defeated army, led them to a field near by. Here he gave the command, "Ground arms!" and the muskets, which had been carried at the right shoulder, were thrown to the ground.

The army which surrendered numbered 7,000 regulars, 2,000 sailors and 1,500 Tories. They delivered to Washington 240 cannon, 8,000 muskets and a large quantity of stores. After the ceremonial of the surrender the color-sergeants of the English regiments delivered their standards to non-commissioned officers designated by Lincoln to receive them.

A number of years ago the question arose as to what had become of these flags and others captured during the War for Independence. A British officer, who was writing a history of the English regiments, wished to secure photographs of them and wrote to the War Department at Washington. The department made a diligent search, but hardly any of them could be found. Two or three captured flags were discovered to be at West Point, where they are now preserved in glass cases in the chapel; but these were taken, it is said, at other places than Yorktown. The Yorktown flags were probably lost during the frequent changes of the seat of government in the early days of the nation, or may have been taken home by different divisions of the American Army when it disbanded, and their history lost sight of before they wore away under the combined attack of time and moths. Perhaps some of them may have had the same fate that befell a flag captured at Saratoga, which was cut up to form part of a crazy-quilt.

The captured army was allowed to return home to England, but under parole not to serve against the Colonies until peace was declared.

The Yorktown Historical Society will cause to be celebrated annually, in impressive manner, the anniversary of the surrender of Cornwallis and his British forces to General George Washington and his allied forces on October 19, 1781.

At the adjourned meeting, on August 18 last, the President was to be named later; other officers elected were: First Vice-President, Oswald Tilghman, Easton, Md.; Second Vice President, Henry Morris, M.D., Philadelphia, Pa.; Historian, Rev. George Washington Dame, Baltimore, Md.; General Counsel, Conway H. Shield, Yorktown, Va.; Treasurer, L. C. Catlett, Gloucester, Va.; Secretary, William Shields McKean, Washington.

October 19 should be made a holiday to commemorate the surrender at Yorktown, in Virginia, and the quaint old town, though aside from the main lines of travel, should become a place of historic pilgrimage for every patriotic American.

KOREA'S NEED OF MEDICAL MISSIONS

Native Patients Awaiting Hospital Treatment

IF our friends at home only knew more of the condition of the people here in Kwang-ju, Korea, their poverty and suffering, and especially what benefit a good hospital would be to them, our friends would be more than willing to help. Most of the hospitals in Korea are self-supporting.

We have already secured a site for the hospital. View and location are all that could be wished. The city of 10,000 is connected with the hospital site by a large public road. The population of the field reached by Kwang-ju Station is estimated at 700,000. Among all these people there is not one native physician who knows anything of medical science. The ignorance of these native practitioners is appalling.

Two illustrations will suffice: Here is an infant with an enlarged spleen. It is believed to be a live turtle inside the child, and the native doctor proceeds to kill the turtle by the local application of a red-hot iron on the child's skin. There are very few children who do not bear the mark of this horrible burn. Here is a sick man, in great pain. A "devil" has gotten into him and must be let out, so the native doctor plunges a large needle—the "chim"—reeking with germs, into the seat of the pain, be it joint, abdomen or lung—the eye not even excepted—for he is utterly ignorant of anatomy. A patient came to me just a few days ago, with four openings, where the doctor had pierced him with the "chim." I have seen many pathetic cases near death's door from this inhuman treatment.

We already have a class of bright boys studying medicine, and with five or six years of training they will be able to go out and be a great relief to their poor, ignorant brethren.

Besides the hospital, we are very much in need of a nurse. Who will answer these calls? R. M. WILSON.

Revivals in China and Korea

WRITING from Kuling, China, August 23, to this paper, Bishop J. W. Bashford, of the M. E. Church, sends this encouraging news:

"We have had some marked manifestations of the outpouring of the Spirit upon our work in China. I have made trips through the Foochow and Hinghwa Conferences, and found some remarkable revivals in progress there. The Chinese were holding prayer meetings at half-past five o'clock in the morning. I never witnessed such contrition and confession of sins as in these services. The missionaries later procured a tent which would hold five thousand people, and this was frequently crowded, and overflow meetings with nearly half as many more in attendance were held. The missionaries had called in one hundred and fifty pastors, local preachers and exhorters, and eighty-seven teachers of day schools in that Conference under our church, and these have carried back the revival throughout the Conference. The Hinghwa Conference is in the southern part of Fukien Province, about five hundred miles south of the latitude of New Orleans, but despite the heat and the plague revivals are in progress throughout the Conference at the present time.

"In a recent visit to Korea I made another delightful discovery. Our churches in Seoul and Pen-Yang number six to eight hundred people, and the Presbyterian churches are still larger. At the close of the morning services the Korean laymen, in all these mission churches, form themselves into bands of two or three, often sixty of these bands being formed out of a single congregation. These go into various parts of the city and out to the villages and repreach what they have heard in the morning service and in the preceding prayer meeting, and invite the villagers to become Christians. At the week-night prayer meeting as many of these groups as possible report the results of the preceding Sunday, and they all gather experiences from these meetings for use on the next Sunday afternoon. Do you wonder that six or eight hundred people come to prayer meeting in Korea?

"We are now busily introducing this method for the self-propagation of the Gospel into China. I love to think that you often keep us in mind in your prayers.

"Kuling, China. J. W. BASHFORD."

MAKING WORK A MERRY PASTIME

ALL over the land, remarkable sights have been witnessed recently when parents gathered to see the display of work done by the children who have attended the Bible Vacation Schools, which recently closed for the season. It was remarkable for many reasons. Few would have believed that children could have been drawn from their play to work at manual labor. Neither would most people credit the statement that such small children as those who have attended the vacation schools could have been taught in so short a time to make the prettily finished articles that are displayed in the churches as the result of the summer classes.

In a majority of cases, the youngsters enter into the spirit of the work with earnestness. Whether it was hammock-making, or needlework, or calisthenics, there was never any lack of enthusiasm on the part of the boys and girls. Many have been taught to make articles that find ready sale in the stores, and the young hands in this way actually acquired useful trades in the vacation schools.

Some of the baskets shown in the exhibits would do credit to any experienced workman. They are made in novel designs, stenciled with pretty patterns, and, filled with flowers, they look attractive enough to command a ready sale. But the articles made in the Vacation Schools are not intended for sale. Many of the best were presented to the children in the city hospitals. As many as wished could retain their own handiwork. The articles made were of great variety. Besides baskets of countless shapes and sizes, there were paper furniture, drawings, fancy boxes, hats, quilts, needlework, embroidery, and dolls dressed by the little girls. When these had been finished, the children were taught how to make hammocks, quilts and sofa pillows. The boys proved adepts at basket making and weaving. Drills and calisthenic exercises interspersed the manual work, and class singing and "first aid" lessons added to the interest.

"This is the greatest challenge of the century to our churches to open the doors and take the children off the streets," says one of the ladies actively identified with the Vacation School work. "Perhaps they will wear out the matting and scratch the furniture, but it should not be forgotten that the children are the chief asset of the nation. And the churches need the children to ensure their own growth. This work is becoming so popular that I believe the time is coming when every church in our large cities will have a summer school."

The long summer vacation makes these schools a moral and industrial necessity. Left to their own resources and unrestrained, the children almost live on the streets and fall into bad company. This the Vacation Schools prevent and at the same time they give the children pleasure, teach them some practical employment, develop habits of industry and neatness, cultivate the love of music and elementary art and give them physical exercises under proper instructors, which strengthen the body and improve the health. In every way, therefore, the Vacation School is a benefit to the children.

Back to Nature

ONE of the penalties that seem inseparable from the Presidential office is that of being invited to elaborate and indigestible dinners whenever the chief executive leaves the White House for a tour through the States, or providing elaborate banquets when at home, to foster good feeling among the nations and headaches among the diplomats.

President Taft is famous for his good nature, and he has enjoyed his trip West immensely; but as one banquet followed another from his generous hosts, he began to be alarmed over what might be the result. He appreciated the spirit in which the dinners were given and admired the versatility of the cooks who could serve dishes the like of which man had never gazed upon and which only the bravest dared to commit to the keeping of his digestive organs. There arose, however, within the heart of the President a strong desire for a return to the simple life, to simple food, for rest undisturbed by the tune, "See, the Conquering Hero Comes!" played just after he had caught a few snatches of sleep on his car at midnight, after a strenuous day of speech-making and handshaking, or the non-dulcet tones of "Hail to the Chief," played at a junction at three-thirty in the morning.

When the President reached the Yosemite Valley he got back to nature for three days. "The change came just at the right time," he said; "I was just beginning to feel the strain. Isn't it great to be able to sit down and not have to think about a speech?"

The President hopes that his brief trips back to nature will give him renewed strength for his fall work, a wish in which his fellow-countrymen heartily join. No better place for recuperating could have been selected than the great West, with its wonderful air, magnificent scenery, and kind and hearty people to show him the sights.

The Bible as a Moral Guide

AFTER a most unusual silence of several weeks, the Divinity School of Chicago University again plunges recklessly into the limelight with a new attack on the old Bible. It appears in the university magazine, which represents the general view of the faculty, and is designed to influence the student mind. It undertakes to prove that the Bible is not a safe and reliable guide in ethical teaching, and that the theologian of to-day who so employed it would find that it failed to condemn many things "which our own moral sense must condemn." The good Book, it declares, "fails to mention some of the problems which are foremost in our modern life." It is apparently the opinion of these remarkable critics that the Biblical writers, besides recording the history, the philosophy and the prophecy of their own age, should have looked several thousand years ahead and dealt with such subjects as strikes, the liquor traffic, child labor, and other up-to-date questions. In other words, it should have been specific and should have laid down rules applicable to specific conditions which were wholly outside of the world's experience in Bible times. Failing in this specific provision, it is to be condemned.

It is hardly conceivable that such puerile logic could be employed to pick flaws in the sacred Word by any one who is really familiar with the Bible. Any intelligent student of its pages knows that, while it does not deal specifically with modern conditions, yet it is a safe and perfect moral guide for all emergencies that can possibly arise in human experience. It lays down standards that are just as much suited to universal application to-day as when they were written. Its rules of conduct touch on every phase of life—social, domestic, national, civic and commercial. Nothing escapes its comprehensive scope, and it is not difficult for any one to find in its teachings the broad principles of conduct that apply to the very questions brought up by the Chicago professors. Truth, righteousness, justice, integrity, honesty, faithfulness, generosity, mercy are qualities that do not change character with the passage of time.

These intermittent assaults on the Bible—the "impregnable rock," as Gladstone called it—are to be regretted chiefly because of their pernicious influence on students who cherish the hope of some day winning men to Christ through the Gospel. Persistent depreciation of Bible authority and doctrine is a strange preparation for such a career. Meanwhile, the course that is now being followed is unworthy of a great university. To the world outside, which is quite capable of forming its own estimate, it is neither dangerous nor even clever, but simply ridiculous.

The Hosts of Temperance

SELDOM has a demonstration so dignified and so impressive been witnessed in any American city as that which took place recently in Chicago, when a thousand different organizations, religious and civic, paraded as a protest against the saloon. There were over 25,000 persons in line. They were not the riff-raff of the slums, but the representatives of Chicago's best citizenship. Men, women and children marched together with banners and music. It was an object lesson which conveyed, more than anything else could possibly have done, an idea of the tremendous strength of public sentiment and of the attitude of the people of Chicago toward the drink evil. It was the protest of the Western homes against the influence that has dragged tens of thousands of boys and young men down to wasted lives and early graves.

Perhaps the most striking testimony given in recent years in favor of temperance is that of Major-General Frederick Dent Grant, who rode at the head of the Chicago procession. This eminent soldier, son of a distinguished father, said:

Because moderate drinking is a practical impossibility, I became an absolute teetotaler. I do not use it even in my house. Drink is the greatest curse, because practically all crime and all disaster are the result of it. Ninety-five per cent. of desertions and acts of lawlessness in the Army are due to drink. If I could, by offering my body a sacrifice, free this country from the fell cancer, the demon drink, I'd thank the Almighty for the privilege of doing it. If I had the greatest appointive powers in the country, no man would get even the smallest appointment from me unless he showed proof of his absolute teetotalism.

This incontrovertible argument against indulgence in alcoholic poison, in any form or degree, deserves to be framed and hung up in every home, schoolroom and workshop in America.

The Growth of Good Manners

THE importance of courtesy has always been acknowledged. Its moral value, its commercial value, and especially its social value, have, in a general way, impressed the world from the beginning of recorded time; but it has remained for us of recent years to realize to the full the overpowering significance of good manners.

We have seen some highly qualified teachers fail, with all their reading and study, from the lack of good breeding. Certain merchants, professional men, artisans and day laborers, we see forging ahead of their fellows, not because they can do their work better, but because they know how to speak and act courteously.

At first blush, this may strike one as the extreme of injustice. Real merit, it may be argued, should claim first place, for all considerations of outside grace. But the truly fine and convincing manner comes from corresponding goodness within. Its counterfeit cannot deceive the discerning observer. It stands for genuine quality through and through.

Is it to the influence of the household journals, with their pathetic Question-and-Answer departments in this line, that the great improvement in the general behavior of our people is due? Have the common schools contributed the chief impetus to it? Has the public library, with its ameliorating and uplifting force, been the principal factor? Have the churches greatly helped it?

Who shall say? It can only be affirmed that he who travels much along the highways and among the homes of our people sees an enormous advance in their general outer conduct over that of twenty or thirty years ago.

Our fathers builded the stately fabric of our government for lofty ends. Human liberty, religious freedom, equality of opportunity were uppermost in their minds; but with all of these, as they have developed, has come a germ of which they little thought, the germ of the grand and kingly manner—sure and self-possessed, yet modest and gentle. This should belong to the highest American type, and, in spite of some discouraging signs, there are many which show that we are on the way to its attainment.

5,000 Blankets for Monterey's Sufferers

OUR readers will be glad to know that their contributions in aid of the flood sufferers in Monterey, Mexico, and the surrounding districts of Nuevo Leon, are producing excellent results. These gifts have been the means of keeping many from starvation.

United States Consul-General Hanna appealed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for 5,000 blankets for the homeless and unsheltered women and children. One thousand blankets were purchased and hurriedly forwarded as a first instalment. Immediately after their delivery, the following telegram was received from Consul-General Hanna:

"Monterey, Mexico, via Laredo, Tex.

"Dr. Klopsch, CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

"I respectfully recommend that you please purchase the balance of the five thousand blankets which you have so kindly offered in the name of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for the destitute of this country, and ship them as fast as possible, allowing the Wells-Fargo Express Company to bring as many as it is willing to carry, and the balance to be shipped by fast freight via Laredo, Texas.

"You can probably arrange with the railroads for free freight for such charitable shipments. The weather is constantly growing cooler, and it looks as though we might have the coldest winter Northern Mexico has ever seen. These blankets will save many precious lives and prove a great comfort and blessing for the poor. I expect to send quite a number of these blankets to many of the outlying towns and villages.

"The manager of one of my burro trains reports that he found one town where no house remains standing and the mayor was living in a tent. I will telegraph you soon relative to the sewing machines for working women.

(Signed) "PHILIP C. HANNA,
"U. S. Consul-General."

On receipt of this urgent appeal the additional 4,000 blankets were purchased and forwarded without delay, through the transportation channels suggested by Mr. Hanna. When this announcement reaches the hands of our readers their generous gift will have been distributed to the poor helpless mothers of Monterey, to whose homeless families they will doubtless prove, Mr. Hanna writes, a great comfort and blessing.

Victories of the Air

THERE was as deep interest in Curtiss and Wright and their flying machines as in anything else connected with the Hudson-Fulton celebration. The bad weather during the week permitted very little flying, and millions were disappointed. Wilbur Wright found good weather, and flew from Governor's Island around Grant's Tomb and back again to the place where he started. Mr. Wright looked at his watch, climbed into the machine, buttoned his coat, pulled his cap down over his ears, gave a little kick at the cork life-preserver that lay at his feet, and said to Charlie Taylor, his trusted helper: "I will be back in thirty minutes. I will land right there by the end of the rail. Have the soldiers keep the crowd away from there. Let her go, Charlie." In an instant he moved into the air as an express train would go out of the depot, and with about the same swiftness, passed over the river and around the tomb, and returned to the identical spot which he had indicated, having traveled a distance of over twenty miles, and arriving only three minutes and thirty seconds late according to his schedule time. Good judges think that this performance was the most notable in the history of aviation. They consider it more marvelous than the flight of M. Louis Blériot across the English channel, as the latter had an open sea and steady winds and only one direction in which to fly, while Mr. Wright had a harbor with a thousand disturbing air currents, caused by the tall buildings and the sea winds sweeping up the river. How fitting that this initial air flight up the Hudson should occur at the time of the Hudson-Fulton celebration! Admiral Sir Edward Hobart Seymour said: "I had the pleasure of watching Mr. Wright's wonderful performance from the deck of the Inflexible this morning, and must say that it afforded a grand spectacle. The thing that impressed me most of all was the steadiness of the machine. After seeing Mr. Wright's exhibition, I am sure that the aeroplane is here to stay." About the time Wilbur Wright made his wonderful voyage, his brother Orville was making the world's record for high flying, in Germany, soaring to an altitude of 500 metres (1,640 feet). Just before making the record-breaking trip, he took William, Crown Prince of Germany, with him on a short journey through the air. Mr. Wright said: "The Prince was the most tickled passenger I ever carried. He was the first royal personage to ascend in an aeroplane. King Alfonso wanted to make a flight at Pau, but the Spanish Cabinet would not permit it. The Crown Prince laughed like a happy child while we were up. He kept calling to me imploringly, 'Higher, higher!' and I carried him up seventy feet."

Wilbur Wright in His Aeroplane Flying Above the Hudson River

The Prince impetuously snatched a pin from his necktie and gave it to Mr. Wright. It is a gold pin, with the initials of the Prince in rubies and diamonds. The Wright brothers have evidently discovered the secret God gave to the birds for the mastery of the air, and the revelation of that secret in so practical and painstaking a manner as they have done in their flying machines will be of untold advantage to the people of the world. Hudson mastered the unstable water with his trusted keel. He adjusted the sails to the wind and made it do his bidding. Fulton made the steam drive the craft irrespective of wind or tide. And now the Wrights have overcome the law of gravity and have made the sky a wide sea. It is by the mastery of subtle imponderable agents that we advance and ascend, as much in the intellectual and spiritual as in the material realm. It is the soul that by faith has overcome the gravitation of evil which ascends to the higher realms of truth and love, and soars to the altitudes angelic and divine. The soul that has discovered the secret of God's love in the heart of the crucified Redeemer will bathe itself in the glories of eternity.

They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles. (Isa. 40 : 31.)

Gold Purified by Fire

A story of a woman's patient and disinterested labor of love, during the twenty-seven years that she lay bed-ridden but cheerfully devoted to church work, was told at the eighty-sixth session of the Illinois Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. A telegram was read to the Conference by Bishop Goodsell, telling of Miss Lizzie Johnson, of Casey, Ill. It was then related that Miss Johnson for the last twenty-seven years, while confined to her bed by a lingering illness, had earned for the benevolences of the church $20,000 by embroidering Scripture bookmarks, which had been sold all over the land. What pure gold this was out of the hot furnace of affliction! There is no virtue in suffering in itself, no power to purify the soul, and yet to the true believer it is sanctified by a kind Father in the refinement of the spirit and in the cultivation of the sweetest charity. How this good woman's service, under such difficulties, should encourage the faithful and shame the indolent followers of Jesus Christ!

And I will bring the third part through the fire and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried. They shall call on my name and I will hear them. I will say, It is my people, and they shall say, The Lord is my God. (Zech. 13 : 9.)

Judge and Preacher

Judge Fawcett, in the County Court at Brooklyn some time ago, had occasion to pronounce sentences on forty-three prisoners, who had been convicted of burglary, grand larceny and other crimes. After listening to some of the confessions made by the prisoners to him, the judge said: "Many excellent sermons might be preached on drink as the cause of crime, and it would be well if some of our ministers were to come here and hear the many excuses made by those who come before me for sentence." It is the almost universal verdict of judges, from the Lord Chief Justice of England to the humblest magistrate in the smallest city, that strong drink is responsible for a large majority of the crimes committed. The flimsy pretense that the license tax which the liquor dealer pays is a financial advantage to the community is dissipated when the expense of the criminal courts, jails, poor-houses, the hospitals, the orphanages and the institutions made necessary by strong drink is taken into account. Judge Fawcett is to be congratulated on the moral suggestion accompanying his sentences, and many preachers will illustrate the facts he gave in their public addresses and private teaching.

Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging: and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. (Prov. 20 : 1.)

Wild Beasts in India

Wild animals are still a scourge in India. A Blue Book, issued recently in London, gives these astounding facts: During the past year 793 persons and 20,903 cattle have been killed by tigers; 292 persons and 43,977 cattle by leopards; 277 persons and 9,664 cattle by wolves; 604 people and 326 cattle by other wild animals, while snakes have killed 21,418 persons and 9,839 cattle. This is a fearful loss by furious beasts and poisonous serpents, but it is nothing when compared with the mortality produced by the diseases of India. The average of human life there for men is twenty-three years and for women twenty-four years. English civilization has a loud call to exterminate beasts and snakes that kill the natives, and to clear up and disinfect the plague spots of India, which deplete the population at so fearful a rate. In the fight between barbarism and civilization savage beasts have to be driven from the fields and savage customs from the hearts of men, and there has to be the strongest physical and moral fibre, the most indomitable industry, and all daring courage as well as spiritual consecration to accomplish this task. The weaklings only are afraid of the enemies of the life or health of the people.

The slothful man saith, There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the streets. (Prov. 26 : 13.)

Hero Honored

John King, water tender on the U. S. S. Salem, has been accorded an unusual honor by the Navy Department for extraordinary heroism in saving the ship from serious damage on September 13, when a boiler tube blew out and gases escaped into the fire-room. His act resulted in severe burns about the body, which came near taking his life. The government rewarded him with a medal of honor and the gift of $100. In 1901 King rendered a similar service and received an honor medal. He was then on the Vicksburg, and an accident to the boilers threatened the destruction of the ship. King rushed into the flames and, despite the burns from the fire and steam, managed to open the valves admitting water to the boiler, closed the stop-valves and lifted the safety-valves. One of the watchmen, W. A. Simonson, was overcome by the heat, and King, noticing him, rushed to him in the face of great peril and carried him in his arms away from danger; and, suffering with burns and exhaustion himself, he was taken to the hospital. No captain of a vessel or admiral of a fleet could show a higher type of heroism than was exhibited by this humble water-tender. True men and women, genuine heroes, are found everywhere in the humbler walks of life, ready to do or dare or sacrifice for others. Not all are rewarded by the government, but all have the approval of a good conscience and the promise of a reward hereafter.

Be ye strong, therefore, and let not your hands be weak: for your work shall be rewarded. (II. Chron. 15 : 7.)

Cure for Hog Cholera

Hundreds of thousands of hogs die every year with the cholera. An unfailing cure has just been discovered, which will allay the fears and stop the loss of the farmers who breed swine. In a thirty-day test recently held, conducted under the supervision of the United States Government and the Kansas City Stock Yards Company, the unquestioned efficiency of the serum discovered by Dr. M. Dorset, a government specialist, for the prevention of hog cholera has been demonstrated. Of a poison squad of thirty-five hogs, the thirteen which were not immunized at the beginning of the test are dead, and twenty-two which were treated are perfectly healthy, in an isolated pen at the stock yards. The twenty-two were subjected to every conceivable form of exposure to cholera, and the thirteen which succumbed to the disease died in the pens with the twenty-two at various times in the progress of the tests. The carcasses of the dead hogs were permitted to remain in the pens with the animals that had received the serum sometimes two or three days. Under normal conditions every hog would have been dead. The fact that the twenty-two did not die is absolute proof that the serum is an unfailing preventive of hog cholera. The serum for the tests was furnished by Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, who took a personal interest in the tests and gave them his approval. The hogs used were bought from a Missouri farmer, who was willing to make affidavit that there had been no cholera on his farm in ten years. It is difficult to estimate the economical value of this scientific discovery. Brains are using chemicals and sharpened steel to eradicate the diseases of the lower tribes as well as those of men. The Jew thought that the swine was a fountain of disease, and by divine command refused to touch it or to have any relationship with the Gentile, who considers its meat, either fresh or cured, as a luxury.

And the swine, because it divideth the hoof, yet cheweth not the cud, it is unclean unto you: ye shall not eat of their flesh, nor touch their dead carcass. (Deut. 14 : 8.)

THE LIGHT THAT DID NOT FAIL

*The Pilgrim Fathers and Their Influence on American Life and Character

By MELVILLE E. STONE

THE story of the landing of the Pilgrims on Plymouth Rock is one which, though often told, can never grow stale. It is full of interest and profit, and constantly renewed interest and profit, wherever courage is approved, rectitude of life respected, liberty loved, or genuine manhood honored.

There is a never ending fascination in the study of organic energy. The apparently indivisible atom, inconceivable because of its smallness, as well as the mightiest planet in the universe, equally inconceivable because of its vastness; also, every human thought and every mortal aspiration—those strange impulses which seem to float into the brain and heart from a mysterious nowhere—all of these forces, both material and spiritual, are obedient to the will of the Great Master, doing his bidding and responsive to his intelligent purpose.

The Puritan movement was a striking illustration of this fact. We are now able to look back through the ages and see how, step by step, the world had been unconsciously preparing for such a development. The uplift was slow, the road was tortuous, the struggle was hard, the battle was bloody, and the people were all unmindful of what they were doing. They little dreamed that in their lives, and the part that each one played, be it great or be it small, they were working out a solution of the mighty problem which had been set for them. Such is the mysterious way in which God moves his wonders to perform.

Let us in a moment run over the centuries to see the chain of events which led up to the 21st of December, 1620—the shortest day of the year, that on which the sun shone its briefest hour, but a day pregnant of great issues and to furnish a flood of light to a benighted world. In the elder days, Confucius and Plato and Buddha had glimpses of the Divine. They had "groped blindly in the darkness and had almost touched God's right hand in that darkness." But it was reserved for Jesus of Nazareth to reveal to us the truth in respect of man's relation to his Maker, and his relation to his fellow man. It was on the hills of Judea, and nowhere else, that we learned of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and of love as the mainspring of correct action.

In the largest sense, Christ came to his own and his own received him not. His rejection as the promised Messiah, his betrayal, and his tragic death, are of small consequence compared with the terrible fact that for the succeeding fourteen centuries his sublime teachings came to naught because of the world's refusal to understand or accept them as he would have wished. Scarcely was the scene on Calvary over, before a changeling Christianity took the place of the rightful heir in the cradle of civilization. Christ's own followers made the first mistake. Instead of teaching, as their Master had done, that devout thinking, and devout living, were the ends to be attained, they formulated their worship into the Church at Antioch, with its Bishops, and Elders, and Deacons, and thereafter the form began to answer for the substance. The so-called conversion of Constantine was a disaster, for then the unfortunate alliance of Church and State began. The power and stability of a government was, of course, immeasurably fortified when to the usual and temporal punishments for disobedience were added the threats of eternal torture. The specious argument of Augustine, proposing the substitution of church authority for that of the crumbling Roman Empire, was all that was needed to complete the tragedy. Thus have we been deceived by history. These events have been accounted as great blessings, while, in fact, they were fraught with dire consequences.

We have not time to consider the story of the dark ages. Nor is it needful. We must all, whatever be our viewpoint, recognize the lapse of Christianity from Christ's standard. We are all familiar with the many earnest, but futile, efforts to right things. Every holy order of the Mother Church is a surviving evidence of an attempt to correct.

* An address delivered before the New England Society at Charleston, S. C.

On the east coast of England lies the County of Norfolk, with its capital, the fine old city of Norwich. Away back in the days of William the Conqueror, a company of Dutch weavers had settled there, and had planted seeds of independent thought and action which in time grew to large proportions. They came from that little corner of the world which has been called "the cock-pit of Europe"—these particular ones from Flanders. North Italian influence was strong in the Netherlands. A century before the Christian era, Netherlanders had joined the Cimbri in their invasion of Rome, and when defeated by Marius had taken up their residence in Lombardy. These sturdy Lombards had been fighting for freedom for years and had already established a "parlamento" at Milan. They drifted back down the Rhine to its mouth and carried thither their looms and their spirit of independence. An ancient statute of Friesland, still extant, declares that "the Frisians shall be free as long as the wind blows out of the clouds and the world stands." The continued drift to the adjacent town of Norwich, on the English coast, was an easy and natural one.

The people of Norwich were always an unruly lot. Edward Coke, a Norwich boy, came to be Chief Justice of England; defied the King's proclamation; stopped royal dictation to the judges, and wrote the great Petition of Right, which in the end brought the head of Charles the First to the block. Horatio Nelson, another Norwich lad, came to be a captain in the English Navy, disobeyed orders off Cape St. Vincent, and won an Admiral's rank and undying fame. Tom Paine, still another Norwich youngster, drifted to America, inspired the Colonists to revolt, and then went to France and fanned the flames of discontent there. More important than all, however, Norwich was the Bethlehem of our present day government and our present day Christianity. Nearly two centuries before Luther, the Lollard movement had passed over from Holland to Norwich. In the middle of the fourteenth century these same Dutch weavers—the wise men of the east of England—were among the most zealous of John Wyckliffe's followers. There was preached to a sympathetic congregation his propaganda for vital piety and the separation of Church from State.

There and then the fires were lighted, which were destined to flash around the world. A goodly number of martyrs went joyously to the stake. The battle was on. Thenceforward we can see what the Germans call Wahrheit in Fortschritt (Truth on the march).

One day Henry the Eighth tired of his Spanish wife Katherine. The Pope refused a divorce. He broke with the Mother Church and married a Norwich girl, Anne Boleyn. This girl's mother was the daughter of the Duke of Norfolk. If you remember that the Spanish Katherine's daughter was Mary Tudor, while the Norwich Anne Boleyn's daughter was Queen Elizabeth, you will see how the thing worked out. All the time it was the spirit of the Spanish Cavalier against that of the Dutch weavers. When Wyckliffe's dead body had been dug up and burned, it was believed that there was an end of his heresy. The latest edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica says that within forty years after his death his influence was extinct. Poor history that!

> The Avon to the Severn runs,
> The Severn to the sea;
> And Wyckliffe's dust was spread abroad,
> Wide as the waters be.

The weavers were continuously at work fashioning a fabric of enormous worth to all mankind, a fabric frequently dyed in a martyr's blood. And the Dutch printers. They too were busy. They were printing Bibles before Luther was born. Amsterdam was little more than a hundred miles from Norwich, and there was constant communication between the two places. Thus it was that each weaver had his Bible which he prized above all his other possessions. They were known in England as the "Bible men." This went on until the English Court printer succeeded in having his government forbid the sale or use of the Dutch Bibles. Secret Bible reading and secret worship naturally followed.

Thomas Bilney, Latimer's most trusted coadjutor, went to the stake in Norwich in 1531. Like their shuttles, the weavers went flying back and forth between Norwich and Holland to escape persecution, and to spread their views. Although it took a century and a half for the seed which Wyckliffe planted to come to fruitage, there never was an hour when the weavers were idle. In 1555, Hugh Latimer himself went to the stake at Oxford crying out to his companion, as he embraced the flames: "Be of good cheer, Master Ridley, and play the man; for we shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England as (I trust) shall never be put out."

Only five years later, one was born who was destined to snatch up that candle and bear it aloft. This was Robert Browne. When scarce twenty-one years old, he was appointed domestic chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk, and this took him to Norwich. He soon caught the spirit of the place. It was ever a hot-bed of revolt. By this time the Dutch weavers constituted more than half the population. For a hundred and fifty years they had refused their adhesion to either the Roman or English Church, and had worshiped secretly or openly, as they dared, in an independent congregation. At this time the local bishop happened to be a tolerant man, so the weavers had established a public church, and to its pulpit they called young Browne. In less than a year, however, some one was sent down from London to stop the business, and then, as they had often done before, many of them scurried off to Holland, taking Browne with them.

Much has been made of Browne as the founder of a Separatist movement. This is a mistake. The movement was nearly two centuries old when he came to it. The Norwich folk had been steadily at work all the time. Their light had never failed. And Browne was a pretty weak and unworthy person at best. In Holland he wrote some forceful books, which were secretly introduced into England, and had influence, but later he recanted, went back to the Established Church, and died peacefully within its fold.

Neither shall we, if wise, give too much glory to the Puritans of Queen Elizabeth's day. They were

A PAGE FOR AMERICAN MOTHERS

By Margaret E. Sangster

Little Courtesies

A LETTER reached the editor of this page one day last summer, a letter so urgent in its appeal for sympathy and so touched with realism that it was put aside to be the text of a future talk. The letter itself was answered to the best of the editor's ability, but the topic is of vital concern to multitudes of homes. The writer was the wife of a prosperous farmer, and she was some years beyond middle age. She had worked hard in her earlier life, and had been happy to share the privations incidental to the start of a married pair who had little money and must wrest their living from the soil. Her complaint was not that she doubted her husband's truth and fidelity, his love or integrity. What she did say was that, although he had good manners for the prayer meeting and the primary, could be perfectly civil on occasion to people whom he met on business, and was extremely polite to younger women when they visited in the home, he was constantly crusty and even boorish in his behavior to her. In the days when it was necessary that every penny should be saved she had cheerfully done the hardest part of the work without assistance, and she had forborne requesting him to lift heavy weights for her, to carry water, split wood and do other little things that are usually done by the men of a family. Now that their means were sufficient to allow this wife of many years all the hired help she asked, the husband either grudgingly assented, if for very shame he could not refuse, or else declined to pay for assistance in the domestic realm. There were no daughters in the household, and the mother bitterly observed that perhaps she ought to be thankful for this, since they might have grown up to be as selfish as their father and as indifferent to her comfort as her sons. "My boys imitate their father in everything, and put me down at every turn, as if I were not worth listening to and were indeed what I fear I am fast becoming, a mere worn-out household drudge."

As if this recital were not enough, the letter went on to say what every woman will comprehend as a great trial. "I have not had a wholly new gown in five years, nor a pair of kid gloves in the same time, although there is no poverty to prevent my having what I want at this time. When I ask my husband to come to the table wearing a coat and necktie he simply laughs in my face, and he shuffles about the house in old carpet slippers that look as if they had been the property of Noah in the Ark. As for politeness from my husband or sons, I have ceased to expect it." In the end of the letter the discouraged soul dropped her final word. "Unless the dear Lord kindly lets me die pretty soon, the only relief I shall be able to find will be in deserting my home and starting out, from nearly sixty, on an independent course of my own. No one who could spend three months under my roof would blame me for breaking away from a life that has grown insupportable."

Both husbands and wives need to be reminded once and again of the great value of little courtesies. Giving a wife actual help in tasks too great for her physical strength does not fall under the heading of a small civility. This is simply the wife's due, and every good husband accepts it and is proud and glad to yield his help without considering himself in the least oppressed.

Probably many men who offend against the rule of loving kindness that should prevail in every home were ill-taught in their early youth. The sons, for example, who may go forth from the home in question will be much more likely to repeat their father's conduct than to treat their wives as they ought. This mother was not wise when her boys were little and under her control. Whatever they saw in their father should have been to them an object lesson to be avoided and not imitated. Mothers should insist on receiving courtesy in every little thing from the children they are bringing up. Husbands who are in reality and in the depths of their nature faithful and affectionate should remind themselves that they may best retain the devotion of wives by conduct that is uniformly thoughtful. The little courtesies oil the wheels of intercourse and keep the hinges of the household from creaking.

Surely it is easy to say "thank you," to utter a word of praise and to pay an occasional compliment to one whose whole being has been a life-long surrender to the man who won her to stand at his side for weal or woe. Surely a man should think twice before he behaves meanly toward a woman who has no other resource than his purse for her clothing, food and shelter. She is not his chattel; she is his equal, and she should be his dearest friend. Why should he deny her comfort and luxury if they are within his reach?

One cannot give other counsel to a sorely tried wife except the old counsel to be patient, charitable and loving, to the end of the day. To both husbands and wives the spectator at the side of the road sends a fervent wish that they will put the right value on little courtesies.

GRANDFATHER'S BABY

Twice in a lifetime we folk on earth
Know the sweet fulness of shadowless mirth:
Once when in childhood we play with toys,
Once when in age we are merry as boys.
Grandsire and grandchild are blissful together,
Over them both shines the same cloudless weather.

—ENQUIRER. Use your fork at your own discretion. There is no rule. Peas are usually eaten with a fork, held as if it were a spoon. They may be eaten with a spoon if that method is preferred. Small individual dishes are little used at present, except for sauces that cannot be conveniently served on a dinner plate.

—R. T. G. Your complaint that your memory does not serve you shows that you are by no means exceptional. Few people beyond middle age can accumulate new stock with the ease of childhood. Yet I know three persons beyond seventy who acquire information, learn portions of history by heart and remember dates and facts precisely as well as they did in their student days. Memory is a good servant, but it must be held to its work. I advise you to improve yours by forcing it to remember a single event each day, or by learning by heart every day a verse of poetry or a verse of Scripture.

A Certain Rich Man

DURING the last forty years the question has been often repeated, Where shall we find the great American novel? From time to time the honor of writing a romance racy with the soil has been claimed by one and another. Long ago Hawthorne wrote The Scarlet Letter, a psychological and ethical story touched with intense sadness, grim and gray as a bleak New England sky. Harriet Beecher Stowe wrote Uncle Tom's Cabin, a book that fell with dynamic force into the midst of ante-bellum slavery. Winston Churchill has written a series of historical novels, each in its turn flashing brilliant light on an interesting and fateful period of our national life. Amelia E. Barr, in her charming Bow of Orange Ribbon, illuminated a portion of the early life of New York, and Robert Herrick in Together did what Robert Grant has also done in several thoughtful books, namely, turned a searchlight upon the decadence and degeneracy of American home life in certain phases and sets of people.

It has remained for William Allen White, in a strong and unconventional narrative, starting at the outbreak of the Civil War, to write of real Americans in real home life in a way that no one heretofore has surpassed. Few have dared to be so simple and straightforward. The book is well worth reading, if only for the exquisite love passages that here and there gleam upon us with the radiance of stars in a twilight sky. The book is a recent issue of the Macmillan Company, and if you have not already read it you have a pleasure in store.

Mrs. Russell Sage As Guest of Honor

Few women are more generally loved and none are more universally esteemed, not alone in New York, but throughout the country, than Mrs. Russell Sage. On Woman's Day during the week of the Hudson-Fulton celebration in New York Mrs. Sage occupied the chair of the guest of honor at the meeting held in the City Hall. Manhattan has reason to be proud of and grateful to Mrs. Sage for her numerous acts of beneficence to the city in recent years. She has been a veritable fairy godmother, touching Central Park to beautify it, restoring and renovating historic places which others had neglected, doing wonders in the old City Hall itself, and lavishly spending her wealth in aid of the poor and the sick. The things she has done and the things she has planned would fill a volume. She is charming in her gracious and dignified matronhood, with an atmosphere about her that is motherly, tender and stimulating.

Every one must rejoice that Mrs. Sage belongs to New York, and that New York delights to pay her homage.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe

Older by ten years than Mrs. Sage, and queenly in her beauty and distinction, Julia Ward Howe, who wrote "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," and thus bestowed upon her countrymen and women the gift of an immortal lyric, was privileged to write a stately poem for the Hudson-Fulton pageant. In literary finish the poem is worthy of the author and of the event that called it forth, although it lacks the fire and spontaneity of the song we love to sing. Still more wonderful it is that Mrs. Howe was able to appear in public before a great audience, reading her poem, thus crowning the Manhattan festival.

MIDNIGHT CALLERS

A STORY IN TWO PARTS

By ISABELLA MACDONALD ALDEN ("Pansy")

Concluded

"WHY not talk it over with him?" said Dr. McKenzie, earnestly. "If what interests you most, just now, is exactly which of the contradictory things that men say about him are the true ones, why, ask him. But if you want, more than that, to get out of the burning house, my advice would be to try his way first, and philosophize with him about it afterwards."

It was more than an hour afterwards that Dr. McKenzie said cordially, "Finish your toilet, brother, and let us go out and get some breakfast; I know a good place not far from here; and afterwards we can talk business."

The man's pallid face flushed, and the embarrassment belonging to one trained as a gentleman took hold of him.

"Oh—" he began deprecatingly, "I am—I mean—that isn't necessary. I don't think I am hungry. I—the truth is, sir, I haven't a cent in the world, and——"

"That's all right, brother, You need a good breakfast, and so do I. We'll go together and get it. I have money enough for two breakfasts. Didn't I tell you I was a servant of the Lord Jesus Christ? This is his plan, not mine; you can trust him. While you are getting ready, I'll step down to the telephone and send a message to a friend."

Then, if the telephone closet had not been closed, might have been heard one of those peculiar one-sided conversations that, after all, tell a good deal.

"Is this Blue two double O?" Is it Miss Rachel Holland? Yes, I see it is. Good morning, blessed fellow schemer."

"Yes, I'm at the Mission now."

"Yes; one of your 'peculiar cases'."

"Yes, indeed; genuine to the core, and peculiarly interesting."

"No, we are just going to breakfast; we shall take it together at The Samaritan."

"No, I have a plan, but it is not fully worked out; details later."

"Oh, no; don't worry about that. What is a servant's time for but to serve his Master?"

"Yes. Is John Edson on duty at any time to-day?"

"Good! couldn't be better. I have a wedding at twelve, and I shall need John then."

"No. John will do better, I think, than anyone else. Have him come to me at a quarter of twelve, sharp."

"No, at my rooms. I want to start things from there."

"All right. Good-by."

The next day her pastor called at Miss Holland's office door, his little pocket note-book in hand.

"Give me Joel Brookford's address, please," he said. And while she turned to it, added:

"It is all right with the man, Miss Rachel. The Lord Jesus Christ has him in charge, and he has gone on his way rejoicing; gone home, where he hasn't been for months. I will give you some of the interesting details when we both have time. 44 Folsom, did you say? Folsom South, I suppose? No? That's surprising! I did not expect to find him on Folsom North! Does that augur well or ill? I'll go and find out. Good-by. Thank you."

In Dr. McKenzie's church some of its members chose each a working motto for the New Year, reporting it at the first mid-week meeting of the year. Miss Rachel had recited her choice in a clear sustained voice: "O Lord Jehovah, thou hast begun to show thy servant thy greatness, and thy strong hand: for what god is there in heaven or in earth that can do according to thy works?"

She was working by it; it strengthened her for service. When the next New Year motto-service came around, she chose it again.

"I cannot do my work without it," she told Dr. McKenzie. And she worked on. "Did you ever hear anything of the man you met at the Emergency Mission in the early morning, last winter?" she asked the doctor. "That one who seemed to take hold of God."

"Not a word," he said, cheerfully. "But you put that wrong, Miss Rachel; God took hold of him."

Miss Rachel sighed. "I cannot help feeling that if it had been real he would have made some sign, during all these months. They generally do, you know."

"Yes, never mind; God is real, my friend; he has only 'begun to show' you his greatness, remember; trust him."

It was on a stormy evening soon afterwards that Miss Rachel sat in her office. It was growing late; she had endured one of her wearing days, and there was yet much to be seen to, with a view to the next day's burdens, before she could think of rest. She sighed heavily as the outer door was heard to open, and murmured to David, who stood at her elbow waiting for the card she was addressing:

"Dear me! I am afraid I had hoped that there would not be another caller to-night. But there will be, of course. It's a bad night, isn't it?"

"It's raining heavily; just the night for our kind."

Then the inner door pushed open softly, and the guest entered. He was not "their kind." Tall, well dressed, with a general air of prosperity, and that peculiar undefinable, unmistakable something about him which marks the gentleman. He came forward swiftly to the desk, his whole manner betokening strong though carefully controlled excitement. As he spoke, he extended his hand to Miss Holland.

"Servant of the Lord Jesus Christ, I'm another. Give me a God-speed to-night. It is just a year, and it was just at this hour that I came before; you sent me to God, and he took hold of me."

David stared, amazedly, yet after a moment with dawning intelligence. Yes, he remembered the night and the man; there had been something about him which—but this one—could they be the same!

Miss Holland knew him on the instant.

"You were right about my mother, that night," he told her, "as you were about everything else; I had a mother, and have, God bless her! She wants to see your face more than the face of any other person. May I bring her in? Yes, she is with me. Mother, come."

She was tall, like her son; a beautiful woman with a face shadowed by great sorrow, and bright with a great joy. She could not find words to express her joy to Miss Holland; and it needed no words. They went away, presently, to their hotel for the night; and John Edson did not have to be called to guard them.

"We are at the Eustis," the man had said, mentioning one of the best hotels in the city. "It was dreadful to bring my mother out so late, but I couldn't resist the temptation; especially as she wanted to come as badly as I did. We are both of us His servants now, and mother wants to leave with you for your work a little token of her gratitude. She knows—we both know—that there was work done for me that night which can never be paid for in the coin of this world; but coffee and beds and breakfasts take money, and we are both His servants now, mother and I; so you will let us help a little from time to time, with that part of the work?"

At the next mid-week prayer service in Dr. McKenzie's church, Miss Holland's word was: "Friends, I have changed my working motto for this year; I have taken just four words: 'We would see Jesus'."

They were busy people, she and her pastor. It chanced that it was nearly three weeks afterwards that she met him for the first time where they could exchange other than business formalities. Then he crossed the street and held out his hand, speaking, as his fashion was, as though the incident to which he referred had just occurred.

"Why did you change it?"

She seemed always to understand him.

"I find this a better working motto," she said, and smiled.

THE END

"THE STRAWBERRY HANDKERCHIEF"

A DELIGHTFUL love story of old Colonial Days in New York. The opening chapter of this New and Fascinating Serial, by Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, author of Jan Vedder's Wife, The Bow of Orange Ribbon, etc., will appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 17. It is a charming romance of that most picturesque period of early American history. Jansen Van Vroom and his wife Katrina, with their sailor son and their pretty daughter, Virginia, and her rival suitors, Joris Artaveldt and Batavius De Vries, make a characteristic group, around which the main action of the story revolves.

Begins in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, November 17.

Christian Love

A PARAPHRASE (I. COR. 13).

THOUGH I had all the gifts of speech
That tongues of men and angels reach,
If Love be not within me found
I am but brass or tinkling sound;
Though I could future things reveal,
The depths of knowledge could unseal,
And though my Faith could mountains move,
Yet I am nothing without Love.
Though all my good to alms I turned,
Or gave my body to be burned,
If Love did not the loss inspire,
Vain hunger fed, or martyr's fire.

Love suffers long—is patient, kind;
Nurses not envy in its mind;
Vaunts not itself—not puffed with pride;
Looks for its neighbors' brightest side;
Unselfish; to compassion prone;
Seeks others' welfare, not its own.
Rejoices most in doing good,
Delights in truth and reetitude,
Takes all things well, both great and small,
Bears, hopes, believes, endures them all.

A prophecy may false become—
The tongue of orator grow dumb—
And knowledge pass, a vanished tale,
But Love alone can never fail.
We see in part, in part foresee—
In perfect light all doubts shall flee.
When as a child, as child I thought—
A man, I treat child's things as nought.
Now through a glass dim forms we trace,
Then shall we see them face to face;
Now a small part is all I own,
Then shall I know as I am known,

Faith, Hope and Love; blest triad ye!
But Love is greatest of the three.

The Anti-Saloon Campaign

THE dedication of the printing and publishing house of the Anti-Saloon League of America took place recently at Westerville, O., where the citizens donated to the organization three acres of ground, on which there has just been erected one of the most complete printing establishments in the country. Rev. Dr. Howard H. Russell, who organized the Anti-Saloon League fifteen years ago, also started the first newspaper, which reached a circulaton of 10,000 to 15,000, during his national superintendency. The work has grown so rapidly in almost every State and Territory of the Union, and Rev. Dr. P. A. Baker has so emphasized the literary department of the league, and has had such able co-operation in editorial management, that the American Issue, which is the organ of the league, has a circulation of 300,000. Bishop David H. Moore presided at the dedicatory services. Addresses were made by Drs. Russell and Baker. When William H. Miller turned over to the national committee the keys of the publishing plant, Mr. Ernest H. Root accepted them, referring to the help that his sainted father, A. I. Root, and the Hon. E. W. Metcalf had given the league at its birth. Dr. Tenney brought greetings from Oberlin, the birthplace of the Anti-Saloon League. Rev. G. W. Young, D.D., brought a message from the Southland. Rev. Dr. Emory Hunt, president of Denison University, brought greetings from the mother league. Mr. Nolan R. Best, editor of The Interior, of Chicago, brought greetings from the religious press.

Mr. F. L. Dustman, for fifteen years managing editor of the Toledo Blade, bespoke the good wishes of the secular press. Dr. T. J. Sanders brought greetings from Westerville and Otterbein University. Rev. Ernest H. Cherington brought greetings from the editorial staff of the American Issue. Miss Frances Ensign, president of the Ohio W. C. T. U., came with woman's blessing as her greeting from her organization. Bishop Moore said, among other things, "The church would be a fool if it did not recognize, support and promote the Anti-Saloon League. The main address of the day was delivered by former Governor J. Frank Hanley of Indiana. Dr. W. G. Clippinger, president of Otterbein University, offered the prayer of dedication, and Rev. Dr. E. S. Chapman pronounced the benediction. Another large building is to be erected in the future, which will be the national headquarters and the home for the Lincoln Legion, the children's department of the Anti-Saloon League, which is under the special care of Dr. Russell, the founder of the league.

A Deaf Mute Confesses Christ

A WRITER in The Christian Endeavor World relates this beautiful incident:

"As the pastor of a church in Columbus, O., Rev. Walter Scott Priest, was calling at the home of a parishioner, he was told that Florence, twelve years old, who had been deaf and dumb since her birth, was anxious to join the church and had asked whether her written confession would be taken as a substitute for the oral confession which she could not make. Being assured that this would be satisfactory, the next evening at the service she walked forward and handed the pastor a slip of paper. Those who knew of the child's affliction were deeply moved as they saw her walk down the aisle, and there was scarcely a dry eye in the house as her confession was read in the following words:

" 'I believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and that he came to this world and lived and suffered and died for our sins. I want to be baptized because he was baptized. I want to live taking him as my guide; and some day I will hear his voice, and that heavenly music will be all the sweeter because I cannot hear sweet music on earth.' "

The Sudden Call

Be so honorable in the world's industry, and so eager to serve, that you will covet the hours you sleep. Work, work! Don't waste time. Don't do things you will have to undo. Keep at your work, and do it right. Pretty soon it will be time to stop; and a strange visitor will come by, and say: "Quit work!" You will say: "It is not night." But he will persist—"Quit work." "It is only two o'clock; I have only just begun for the afternoon." "Quit work!" "It is not sundown yet, may I not work till night?" "Quit work!"

And you will lay down your hammer on the anvil, with your hands black with the grime of the smithy, and you will go out with him, and he will say to you: "It is time to quit work." And you will say: "Will I be back in the morning?" "No, not in the morning." "Will I be back to-morrow?" "No, not to-morrow." "Where are you taking me?" "I am taking you to a land very far off, and from whose 'bourne no traveler returns.' Come! This is the way."

"Can't I go back once?" "No," and somehow there is a little sternness in his voice.

But you will say: "I must go back a minute, only a minute, just once, to tell——" "No, come!"

Oh, who is it? It is the master Death. You cannot go back—not for a minute; no, you might just as well ask for a century as for a minute. Suddenly it will be pitch dark and you will be in the silence, where you can hear the blood beat around your temples like the flow of a rushing river, all alone. Pray God that, when you get there, Christ will be with you, lest you perish in solitude.

WITH CHRIST AT SEA*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"WEIGHED anchor, and sailed along Crete." On August 21, A.D. 60, Paul, with certain other prisoners in charge of the centurion Julius, sailed from Cæsarea, passing under the lee of the Island of Cyprus. On September 4, at Myra, they changed ships, getting on board a wheat-laden vessel, whose destination was Rome. The ship's company, including officers, sailors, merchants, soldiers and prisoners, numbered two hundred and seventy-six persons. The ship made slow progress, owing to contrary winds. On September 19 they sailed under lee of the Island of Crete (this is the island for the possession of which there is now a contention between the Greeks and Turks). It was the season of tempests in that region, and it was urged by Paul that the ship should be taken into a protected winter harbor. There was a difference of opinion which place it should be, Fair Havens or Phenice.

"From it a tempestuous wind." Like a wild beast coming forth out of his lair, so came the wind Euraquilo out of the mountains of Crete and attacked the ship, pushing it wherever it would by its mighty force. It drove them past Crete, under the lee of a small island, Cauda (Clauda). It was now October 19.

"Were able with difficulty to secure the boat"—the small boat, fastened at the stern, almost filled with water. It might be needed as a lifeboat, and hence the effort to bring it on board the ship.

"Undergirding the ship." Passed cables around midship, to keep it from breaking in pieces.

"They lowered the gear." Not the sails, which must have been lowered before, but probably anchors.

"Began to throw the freight overboard." The wheat with which the ship was laden.

"Cast out the tackling of the ship." Probably the mainyard; all of the passengers assisting the sailors, because of the desperate situation. Vessel leaking, drifting in the Sea of Adria; provisions water-soaked; neither sun by day, nor moon and stars by night in sight.

"I exhort you to be of good cheer." Paul speaks to the hopeless passengers, and assures them that there shall be no loss of life among them.

"God hath granted thee all them that sail with thee." Such was the message Paul told them the angel of the Lord had brought to him in the midst of the tempest, only the night before.

"I believe God, that it shall be even so." Paul had the courage of faith as he spoke.

"But we must first be cast upon a certain island." So much was vouchsafed to them to know.

While our interest and sympathies are drawn out by the sea tale we should read Ps. 107:21-32, about those who go down to the sea in ships, how they see the works of Jehovah and his wonders in the deep; how the waves mount up to heaven, and go down again to the depths at God's command; how the ships reel to and fro like drunken men, and cause those who sail to cry unto Jehovah in their trouble, and how he makes the storm a calm so that all are glad.

An Illustration of Life

The ocean journey may be taken as an illustration of life. Some little children have been born at sea. A little girl was born on a ship between England and India. Her parents gave her the sea name of "Marina." She grew up to be a lovely and useful woman, and became the wife of a minister of the Gospel. But not only little children born at sea, but all little children, may be likened in their lives to those beginning a voyage at sea. Think of the baby Moses, in the little ark of bulrushes, which his mother made for him and in which she hid him among the bulrushes in the river Nile. How wonderfully God and the angels watched over that little bark, and gave to the tiny child within it a loving sister's care; the tender sympathy of the princess who adopted the little waif as her own son; and, best of all, the return of the child to his own mother to nurse and to cherish until he was old enough to go and live at the court of Pharaoh. We may call the cradle the boat in which every little child starts out on the voyage of life. And for the baby who has not yet learned to pray we will pray, "Keep me, my God, my boat is so small and the ocean is so wide."

The Sea of Life

The sea. It is the life we live in this world. Its uttermost bound is eternity. When Paul sailed from Cæsarea he did not behold Rome in the distance. But the eternal shore is further away from us than Rome was from Paul. Weeks only were between Paul and Rome; years—a lifetime—is between us and heaven. The ship on which Paul sailed was lashed about in the sea by the tempest, helpless because there was neither sun, nor moon, nor stars to be seen by which the ship's course could be fixed. One who tries to live without God in this world is like a storm-tossed ship at sea without any bearings. When traveling upon Southern seas, in the vicinity of the Philippines and on toward Australia, the heavens at night were marvelous, being so thickly studded with stars. Glancing through the ship's rigging, it seemed as if we were sailing right into the stars. Most beautiful of all was the group of stars known as the Southern Cross; in the early part of the evening it was quite overhead, reminding us that our Saviour was keeping watch over us from heaven above. All through the night it moved downward to the right, and looking out of a porthole just before dawn we could see it down near the horizon. While we had slept God had kept watch over his own. One evening we asked a Christian Chinaman we had met on the ship if any one had ever told him about the cross of Jesus in the sky. "No," he said. And then we said, "We want you to find it for yourself," and with a sweep of the arm we showed him in what part of the heavens it was. He discovered it, and showed so much delight that we would not have been surprised if he had fallen down and worshiped it.

What the Ship Is

The ship: it is our frail body. And yet so wonderful is the body that God names his own attributes after different parts of it. His omniscience, it is God's eye (Prov. 15:3). His omnipresence, it is God's ear (Isa. 65:24). His omnipotence, it is God's arm (Jer. 27:5). The upholstery of the midnight heavens, it is the work of God's fingers (Ps. 8:3). His life-giving power, it is the breath of the Almighty (Gen. 2:7). His dominion, the government shall be upon his shoulder (Isa. 9:6). A body so divinely honored, and so divinely constructed, let us be careful not to abuse it.

There is much to be learned from life aboard ship, particularly a naval vessel, that is helpful to health: the xtreme neatness, the almost constant ashing and scouring, the airing of lothing, the regularity of meals, the iscipline requiring promptness, the arly hours for going to rest at night nd for rising in the morning. Let us ry to keep this life-ship of our bodies n the best condition possible, so that e may do the most for God while we re pursuing our life journey. We ould blame any shipowner who would et his vessel fall into decay for want f oversight and repair. Just as urely we are accountable to God to eep our bodies as well and strong as ve possibly can.

The sailors, they are our desires and mbitions. The sailors on the ship here Paul was were mutinous and isorderly. If they had not been dis-overed and restrained from leaving he ship, they would probably have ost their lives.

Proper Ambitions

Have we any desires and ambitions hat are not in harmony with what God expects of us? Jacob had a dream n which he seemed to see a ladder, nd, behold, the top of it reached p to heaven. We have ladders of mbition; do they reach up to heaven? Or do they reach only to high posi-ions of honor, wealth or fame? Per-haps we have watched a sailor on ship-oard climb with alacrity and safety o the top of the mast and do his work, probably the adjustment of some rig-ing, and come safely down without ny apparent strain upon his nerves. t was because his work was in har-nony with law and order. He was loing just what the master of the ship xpected him to do.

The prodigal son had ambitions and lesires that took him away from his ather's house, that led him to make alse friends, who deserted him when is money was spent, and he was brought at last to be the keeper of wine and so hungry that he would gladly have eaten swine's food. And hen came a change in his desires: he vanted to return to his father and live he rational life. Most fortunate for im was it that he found a father not only willing to receive him, but glad to welcome his return.

The soldiers; the circumstances which limit us. Paul and certain other prisoners were under the guard of Roman soldiers. They were not free to do just as they pleased. In our ives, though we are not prisoners, we find ourselves hindered from doing the things we would like to do. Boys and girls sometimes say: "I have such a poor teacher; I cannot get on well with my lessons." Others say: "If I had a nicer home I would be more hon-ored"; "If I had better clothes, people would respect me more." Just look at Paul: though he was a prisoner he became in fact the commander of all on board when shipwreck was imminent. Though suffering a prisoner's hard fate, he "lived so high above the cloud line" he could furnish cheer for over two hundred people. "Then were they all of good cheer and took food." Paul was superior to circumstances, and so may we be if we will trust in God and do the right.

General Joseph E. Wheeler was spending the night in the home of a friend. His host accompanied him to his room and bade him good night. But afterward, he thought the general might need a glass of water, so he car-ried a pitcher of water to his room and entered without knocking. He was surprised to find General Wheeler on his knees beside the bed, engaged in his devotions. He waited reverently until the general arose, and then he apologized for the intrusion. "Don't mention it," said General Wheeler; "I think all of us ought to kneel before we retire, and thank our Maker for his mercies." Those who knew General Wheeler best say that he would never lie down to sleep without offering a prayer, and never rose in the morning without thanking God for his protec-tion. If we would all do that every day it would make us superior to cir-cumstances, and we should be prisoners of hope.

The compass is the Holy Spirit. There was no compass on the ship on which Paul sailed; it had not then been invented. Ancient mariners looked to the stars for guidance, and when clouds obscured them they were in a dilemma. They had been fourteen days without the sight of sun, moon or stars, and knew not where they were drifting.

When the Lord Jesus took himself from the sight of them that loved him well, and ascended up on high to be with his Father, he sent down the Holy Spirit to be the comforter and guide of those who waited for his coming. "He shall guide you into all truth" was Jesus' testimony concerning the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit then is our divine Compass.

Blessed Comforter, come down,
And live and move in me;
Make my every deed thy own,
In all things led by thee:
Bid my every lust depart,
And now with me vouchsafe to dwell;
Faithful Witness, in my heart
Thy perfect love reveal.

The Chart—The Word of God

Undoubtedly a chart was carried by the mariners on the ship Paul sailed in, or they could not have known when they were sailing under the lee of Cyprus, under the lee of Crete, or how to come by Fair Havens or Phenice. It was not the lack of a chart that made their bearings unknown when they found themselves drawing near to land, which afterward proved to be Melita. They were unable to use their chart.

The Bible is the only reliable chart for use in the voyage of life. And something can be said of it that can-not be said of any other chart in the world: it is published in over four hundred different languages! It is claimed, and rightly so, that the Bible is the most popular book in the world. Upwards of two hundred and sixty millions of copies are now in use. There is no danger of its going out of print, because every year more copies are published than in any year before.

China Needs Native Helpers

"WE feel every year more and more," writes Missionary W. H. Hagqvist, "the need of faithful native helpers in China if we are to do our work efficiently. We need more than ever trustworthy helpers to cope with this new work. I beg to be allowed to introduce to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the names of the following persons:

"Evangelists—Peh Yu Cheng, Yao Pu Yoh, Ch'ang Sien Seng, Tsin Tsi Hsiao, Tsin King.

"Teachers—Chang Sien Seng, Li Yu Chu.

"Bible Women—Yang Si Ho, Chang Kuei Ying, Tuan Ta Sao.

"These are all good and faithful Christians, and we hope that some of your kind readers will undertake their support as missionary substitutes. The support costs for each $50 a year. For this small sum sincere Christians, any man or woman in America, may support his or her own native mission-ary in China."

Answered Prayers

Mrs. R. O. C., Texas. "God has restored to health a precious brother, in answer to prayer."

B. M. C., Ohio. "I wish to acknowledge the answering of prayers by God. He is such a comfort to me, and has answered numerous prayers for me recently. He helps those who help themselves and who have faith and trust in him."

B. K. A., Maine. "I prayed, and the answer came."

D. D. B., Illinois. "God heard and answered a recent prayer."

Mrs. J. E. S., New York. "God has heard and answered my prayers in the last two months."

Mrs. A. B., Ohio. "God has answered my prayer in converting my afflicted son. He has been sick for almost five years."

L. E. H., Buffalo. "I promised to let the world know if the Lord would hear my prayer, and he did hear and answered."

I. A., Chicago. "God has sent a direct answer to my prayers. He has answered a prayer which seemed little short of miraculous."

Mrs. L. E. F., Pennsylvania. "Last fall I prayed, day and night, for God to spare my dear mother, and he has answered my prayer, just as he promised to do."

A. A. S., Iowa. "As a reader of THE HERALD I enjoy the answered prayer column. I have had many answered, and think it a great privilege to have such a dear friend as the Lord."

Mrs. M. A. D., Oregon. "I wish to acknowledge, through this column, a direct answer to prayer for my daughter, who was in great trouble. While we were yet praying He heard and answered."

Mrs. N. C. L., Alabama. "I have been a shut-in for over fifteen years, but, in answer to prayer, I was much improved last year, in so much that I was able to help my aged widowed sister with the work."

A. M. J., Del Rio, Tenn. "I promised God that if he would hear my prayer, and remove one who was dear to me from the man who had an evil influence over him, I would acknowledge it to the world. My prayer has been answered."

DIED IN THE HARNESS

Wilbur F. Meminger, field superintendent of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, died suddenly of heart failure after he had finished a Gospel address before an outdoor audience in New York City, on October 7. He had been speaking very earnestly, and as he was leaving the platform he collapsed. Mr. Meminger was fifty-two years of age, and had been actively associated with the Alliance for nearly ten years.

as bitterly hostile to these Norwich Separatists as any one else. They joined hands with the bishops to exterminate them. A young man, John Robinson by name, went from Cambridge University to Norwich to preach. Of course he caught the infection, and, after four years, the Archbishop silenced him. It was a time of bitter persecution in England, but of the largest liberty in Holland.

The war between Alva, the bloody Spanish cavalier, and William the Stadtholder was over. The Dutch Republic, with freedom of worship, of press, and of school, was in full swing. One after another the Separatist congregations had been banished to the Low Countries. About the only one remaining was that of John Smyth at Gainsborough. William Brewster, postmaster and master printer of Scrooby, ten miles away, and William Bradford, fustian weaver of Austerfield, only five miles away, were members. Thither Robinson took himself from Norwich. In 1606, that congregation followed the others to Holland, and those remaining organized a little church in Scrooby Manor House with Robinson as pastor. Two years later, they in turn escaped across the North Sea.

Once more, too much has been made of this Scrooby Church, and of John Robinson himself. The congregation soon lost its identity in Holland; Smyth apostatized, and on more than one occasion Robinson was ready to return to the Anglican Church. Again, as ever before, it was the sturdy weaver who kept the candle aflame. It was Bradford who led the Pilgrims out of Leyden. He picked up Brewster at Southampton. And of all the one hundred and two souls on the Mayflower, these two alone can be identified as ever having belonged to the congregation at Scrooby.

In writing history, we are ever searching for a leader. It was the very essence of the Pilgrim movement that it had no authoritative leaders. Brown and Smyth and Robinson did not create—they were created. Guided unerringly by a great principle, the people went on with or without the co-operation of their pastors.

I shall not trace the history of these people in America. All are familiar with it. Like the children of Israel, they went into the wilderness to prepare themselves for the Promised Land. In some sense they were a highly educated company. They had the sort of education which Aristotle says "makes one do by choice what others do by force."

We all have moments when we would turn from the wearisome and dangerous struggle to an alluring and an enchanting peace; from self-denial to self-gratification; from the anxieties of the Roman Capitol and the privations of her battlefields, to the Nile banks, the arms of Cleopatra, and the lotus leaves. We have our moods when we sigh for the repose and comfort that is to be found in a protective paternalism. Such was not the spirit of the Pilgrims. Plato's pathetic story of the dying hours of the Athenian democracy, when, under the ministry of Eubulus, "a life of comfort and a craving for amusement were encouraged in every way, and the interest of the citizens was withdrawn from serious things," did not in the least apply to them. They were what Plato called "the small remnant of honest followers of wisdom." Unwilling to buy peace or ease with dishonor, they came to the horrors of a bleak New England wilderness. They would not submit to the arbitrary laws of an English king, yet they imposed upon themselves the most rigorous laws the world has ever known. Well might these laws be called, as they were called, the "self-denying ordinances." They laid deep the foundation of a self-governing people, under which every one should enjoy the largest liberty in respect of his relation to God, but where every man should be obedient to law in respect of his relation of his fellow-man.

And yet I would not have you believe that they alone were responsible for this republic. The late German Ambassador once said in Berlin: "My father was German, my mother Scotch, and I was born in England—that makes me an American." The Pilgrim influence was of limitless value, but it was the attrition and admixture of the Huguenot and Scotch-Irish blood which made us what we are. Bradford, the weaver, as Governor of the Plymouth Colony, brought strength, and religious freedom, and obedience to law. But the Huguenot refugees, who gave us of their loins Francis Marion and the two Laurenses; and the Scotch-Irish, who gave us Andrew Pickens and the two Rutledges, brought a softer and more human and more fraternal spirit. All of these factors went to make up the sum of virtue which characterized our forebears.

The finest expression of the weaver spirit on American soil was in the congregation of the old "Circular Church," of this city. The Massachusetts people turned Roger Williams out for defending "soul-liberty"; here English refugees from Holland, Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, and French Huguenots worshiped side by side in perfect harmony.

And what did they not do for the world? Spain, in the persons of Cortez and Pizarro, returned gold as the result of their adventure. The Pilgrims, the Huguenots and the Scotch-Irish returned human liberty. When the cry of Latimer swelled into a mighty diapason, as the organ tone of Milton rolled around the world, Pilgrims from Massachusetts Bay were back in England voicing the anthem of freedom. It was Franklin and Tom Paine who stirred Paris to revolt. It was at Washington's side that Lafayette learned the lesson of liberty—and out of the French revolution came parliamentary government to continental Europe.

These, our fathers, in storm and stress, through privation and suffering, prepared for us the blessings we now enjoy. If, mindful of their lofty example, we recognize that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," these blessings will endure. To no one as to us comes the divine command: "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land that the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget.

The Lute-Player

SWEET the strain that thy white fingers
Softly charm from out thy lute.
In my heart its music lingers
Long hours after it is mute;
But far sweeter than its numbers
That fine harmony of soul
In thy darkling eye that slumbers,
As the waves of music roll.

On thy gentle brow, O maiden,
Purity and peace abide.
All thy smiles with joy are laden
And with love are glorified.
Thy fair face full many a morrow
Shall the haunts of memory bless;
And God grant that grim old Sorrow
Long may spare its loveliness!

STRENGTH

Without Overloading The Stomach.

The business man, especially, needs food in the morning that will not overload the stomach, but give mental vigor for the day.

Much depends on the start a man gets each day, as to how he may expect to accomplish the work on hand.

He can't be alert, with a heavy fried-meat-and-potatoes breakfast requiring a lot of vital energy in digesting it.

A Calif. business man tried to find some food combination that would not overload the stomach in the morning, but that would produce energy.

He writes:

"For years I was unable to find a breakfast food that had nutrition enough to sustain a business man without overloading his stomach, causing indigestion and kindred ailments.

"Being a very busy and also a very nervous man, I decided to give up breakfast altogether. But luckily I was induced to try Grape-Nuts.

"Since that morning I have been a new man; can work without tiring, my head is clear and my nerves strong and quiet.

"I find four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with one of sugar and a small quantity of cold milk make a delicious morning meal, which invigorates me for the day's business."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Saving Little Child Slaves

A NEW world for children is being discovered in our century as certainly as Columbus discovered a continent in the fifteenth. There is to be a new child world. Homeless and neglected children are bound to be better cared for, and less cruelty will be their portion in the future than in the past, for childhood's problem is coming to the front.

The National Child Labor Committee, of No. 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York, is co-operating with legislators, officials and boards of education to save the American boy and girl from abuse and misuse in premature toil and to enable them to get the full benefit of a practical school education. To this end agitation is going on to improve the laws in reference to child labor. The National Committee, in its four years' existence, has secured or aided in bringing about better legislation in thirty-four States and is using its efforts in the remaining States through twenty-seven State and local committees. In its investigations in cotton fields, coal breakers and glass factories it has found hundreds of thousands of children under sixteen working, while other boys and girls are at study or engaged in play. Children cannot have a fair chance who live in cotton mill districts; 41.3 per cent. of those employed are illiterate, and these are white children of American stock. Boys under ten years of age were found sorting coal in such dust that they could hardly be seen or counted. The dust gets into the lungs so completely that they never get over the coal discoloration of the lung.

Owen J. Lovejoy, Gen. Secy.

New York State has a law that helps "conserve childhood," and one that other States are being asked to adopt, but in that State many children are taught to falsify their ages so as to hire out to greedy contractors. Over two millions of children are believed to be illegal wage earners, and they are at work in cotton mills or in mines and on sweat-shop benches. Owen R. Lovejoy, a lover of children, has become a leading spirit in the child labor movement, and makes platform appeals for them before churches, Y. M. C. A., W. C. T. U. and other philanthropic gatherings and keeps in touch with the committees of other States. Mr. Lovejoy was a successful Congregational pastor, but he gave it up to study social problems that involve the welfare of adolescence. He loves the children he works for and with. He has studied at first hand the "boy shadow" in the coal breakers and the "girl shadow" in cotton fields and mills, and the "cheapening of child life." He is general secretary of the committee, and is working for the answer for the children of the submerged, that they may have a right to play and grow.

From the mine where the midnight engulfs it,
From the mill where the clogged air is thick
With the dust of the weaving that chokes it;
From the home where it's fevered and sick
With man's toil, when God meant it for gladness
The child in the midst, in our day
God-moulded, greed-marred, calls to heaven
For the vengeance we're daring this day.

ASTRONOMICAL QUERIES

By Prof. S. P. Leland, Seabreeze, Fla.

F. F., Stronghurst, Ill. According to the spots on the sun, how many more wet seasons are we to have?

If the spots on the sun have any influence upon our seasons, to make them wet or dry, the influence is so remote that our astronomers have never estimated it with certainty. Were the spots very large, compared with the size of the sun, they might affect our temperature, temporarily, in a very slight degree, nothing more.

C. F., Keysville, Fla. 1. On what day does the sun rise and set east and west? 2. When is the north star just north?

1. About March 20 and September 20. 2. What is called the north star is not in the north, and the polar line of the earth is moving from it. About 1,000 B.C. it was nearly on the line of the polar axis, but the majestic revolution of the stars pushed the line farther and farther away. At the beginning of the Christian era there was no star on the polar line. At about 800 A.D., the line passed near a small star in the Giraffe. Our present polar star is one of the brightest that lies near the line, and has won its honor on that account. It is a star of the second magnitude, and will continue near the polar line for a thousand years. About the year 6,000 A.D. the polar line will pass between the stars Beta and Iota, in the constellation of Cepheus, and in 7,000 years more Alpha, in the same constellation, will be the polar star.

W. P., Upper Kintore, N. B. Is Halley's comet now visible?

It is visible now by the aid of our large telescopes. It is anproaching our sun, but will not be visible to our unaided eyes until March or April of next year.

M. S. R., Port Byron, N. Y. What is the name of the star which we see in the southeast in the evening, so exceedingly bright that many believe it to be an artificial light, a balloon, or something of that sort?

It is the planet Mars. It presents its entire face to us, and shines with exceptional brilliancy.

M. P., Salem, Mass. I read recently that our astronomers are using the Ptolemaic table to compute ancient eclipses. Where can I find the latest or most approved tables? Are the tables in James Ferguson's Astronomy, 1799, good?

The Ptolemaic tables are used to some extent by astronomers, but the tables are more or less modified by the later astronomy. The motions of the sun, moon and some of the planets may be calculated by them. Ptolemy's system was based upon the hypothesis that the earth was the fixed, flat centre of the universe, and around it all other bodies swam. His tables are particularly valuable, as giving the places of the principal stars in ancient times. The astronomers are enabled now to calculate the real or apparent motions of these stars by comparing their positions then with their present positions. I am not acquainted with the tables in Ferguson's Astronomy, but presume they are probably correct.

A BANKER'S NERVE

Broken by Coffee and Restored by Postum.

A banker needs perfect control of the nerves and a clear, quick, accurate brain. A prominent banker of Chattanooga tells how he keeps himself in condition:

"Up to 17 years of age I was not allowed to drink coffee, but as soon as I got out into the world I began to use it and grew very fond of it. For some years I noticed no bad effects from its use, but in time it began to affect me unfavorably. My hands trembled, the muscles of my face twitched, my mental processes seemed slow and in other ways my system got out of order. These conditions grew so bad at last that I had to give up coffee altogether.

"My attention having been drawn to Postum, I began its use on leaving off the coffee, and it gives me pleasure to testify to its value. I find it a delicious beverage; like it just as well as I did coffee, and during the years that I have used Postum I have been free from the distressing symptons that accompanied the use of coffee. The nervousness has entirely disappeared, and I am as steady of hand as a boy of 25, though I am more than 92 years old. I owe all this to Postum." "There's a Reason." FOUNTAIN PENS

Here at the right you see the curved ink feed of the Parker. Straight ink feeds hold ink after the pen is returned to your pocket, until air expanded in the reservoir by the heat of your body forces it out into the cap. That's why you see a man wiping off the barrel before using common fountain pens; why he often inks his linen and fingers when he removes the cap to write.

But the curved ink feed of the Parker—the Lucky Curve—is self draining. It clears itself of ink, giving free passage to expanding air. So the Parker is cleanly.

SHALL WE KNOW OUR FRIENDS IN HEAVEN?

SHALL we know our earth-loved friends in heaven?
This it is for which our spirits long;
Will this comfort unto us be given,
When we meet them mid the angel throng?
Will they talk to us of things remembered?
Will they love us fondly, as of yore?
Shall we find in them the same devotion?
Will they seem as they had seemed before?

Shall we know the dear ones who have vanished,
Leaving us for many lonely years?
Leaving us with all our gladness banished,
Leaving us to bitterness and tears?
Will their smiling be the smiling olden,
Or more lovely, kindly, better far,
When they meet us in the city golden,
With their faces radiant as a star?

We shall know them—let us never doubt it!
Since the Christ hath prayed for all his own,
That they might be with him in his glory;
Surely each to each must there be known.
Then, if there with him in blessed union,
Over on the fair celestial shore,
With our own we shall have sweet communion,
And we shall not know them less, but more.

Fighting the Drink Evil

DR. WILBUR F. CRAFTS, one of the teachers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Million Bible Class of readers, is now engaged in bringing out new editions of two books by which he seeks to get temperance into the missionary and Sunday School departments of regular church work, because he believes that reform societies are but a thin skirmish line, and only the main army of the Church of God is big enough to conquer the big four evils—intemperance, impurity, gambling and Sabbath-breaking. One of these books is Intoxicating Drinks and Drugs in All Lands and Times, chiefly devoted to the missionary fight against the white man's rum and opium in mission fields. It includes the recent Shanghai Conference of Nations on Opium. The other volume is The World Book of Temperance, which is really a cyclopedia of temperance, giving a brief commentary on all Bible passages about wine or drunkenness; a history of the temperance movement from the beginning; a collection of sayings of "Eminent Men on Drink," and a great supply of good stories to illustrate temperance lessons and speeches. This big book of 288 octavo pages can be had for 75 cents, from the International Reform Bureau, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.

Aiding Armenian Refugees

CROWDS of Armenians, refugees from the recent barbaric massacres around Adana, are already flocking to America. Many of them are the only survivors of once numerous households, and many others were of wealthy and prosperous families. And now, having sacrificed all to Turkish oppression and Moslem fanaticism, barely escaping with their lives and some still bearing the scars of wounds, these hapless Christians are emigrating to America, where they hope to establish new homes, safe from the murderous attacks of Kurds and Circassians. In order to assist these new-comers with practical information concerning labor prospects and settlement localities, a Bureau of Information has been started, under the auspices of the Gotchnag, an Armenian religious weekly paper published in New York. Another object of the Bureau will be to furnish American employers with information concerning Armenian workmen, as it has been found that generally very little is known about them.

There are now thousands of Armenians employed in various factories, stores, offices, hotels and private houses. In all these places they have soon been noted for their national traits of industry, thrift, temperance and obedience.

Any inquiries concerning this subject would be promptly attended to by the Bureau, and any suggestions, advice and co-operation would be gratefully accepted. The work being purely humanitarian and patriotic, no fees whatever are charged or accepted. All communications should be addressed to the Armenian Labor Information Bureau, 254 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

ONLY WAIT

SOMETIMES there dawns a sudden brightness
On days gray and forlorn;
Sometimes there springs a sudden lightness
In hearts long over-borne.
As morning wears to darkling even,
Disconsolate and slow,
From the unseen rich strength is given,
And gleams the after-glow.

No soul so dull but feels its sorrow;
No heart but knows its pain,
And longs for some divine to-morrow
To bring sweet peace again.
In humble home or stately palace
Joy breaks when grief is past;
Long patience drains its golden chalice,
And claims her own at last.
—KATE UPSON CLARK.

The Boy, The Beast and the Jungle

THE trouble started originally with the boy—just a grimy, unattractive little street urchin, such as you could pick up anywhere. But because he tried to rub that ugly look off the faces of the boy and his mates, JUDGE LINDSEY became involved in a fight that has set all his state ringing.

We are spending fifty thousand dollars in advertising Judge Lindsey's story, in a little less than fifty days. That's over one thousand dollars a day. What's the object? It's to get YOU, and every man and woman like you in the country, interested in what Judge Lindsey is saying. Not because it's such a fine bit of literature, although you'll find it great reading at that. Not because it's an exposure, though no story in years has so utterly stripped the mask from the powers that prey.

But just because BEN B. LINDSEY, the man, has poured his whole soul into this effort to show precisely what the politician and the judge are up against if they try to "stay straight," and because his story brings home to you for the first time the facts on which a new and finer municipal state and national life may be builded.

You'll find it just beginning now in Everybody's Magazine. Get it and read it.

Cincinnati's Gospel Wagon

The Gospel Wagon Ready for an Evening Service

A REMARKABLY successful evangelistic campaign for the reaching of the non-church-going masses has just closed in Cincinnati, O. Under the auspices of the City Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church a fine Gospel wagon, equipped with a large organ, two cornets, singers and speakers, is upon the street every evening from June 1 to September 1. Among the volunteer force of workers are to be found the most prominent ministers and laymen of the city. Great care is taken that only the most efficient persons are in charge of these summer campaigns. The work, after fourteen successful seasons, is now recognized as one of the great forces for city evangelization. Money is provided for carrying on the work and no collections are taken. Money offered by interested persons upon the streets is declined.

From fifteen to twenty workers are upon the wagon each evening, and the work is carried on on non-sectarian lines. At the close of each meeting an altar service is held, and during the present season over five hundred persons have knelt at the platform seeking Christ, while about two thousand publicly requested prayer and expressed a desire to lead a Christian life. An effort is made to follow up all converts, and they are urged to unite with the church of their choice. Thousands of people of all classes who never enter a church building are reached. In almost every church of the city men and women are found who were converted at the Gospel wagon.

Miss Anna Agnes Smith, of Stapleton, N. Y., has been in charge of this season's campaign. She is an evangelist of unusual ability and her zeal is unbounded. She has been most successful in superintending this strenuous work and has addressed every meeting. Her presentation of the Gospel appeals to the heart, and her spirituality and her fine, clear voice add not a little to her efficiency.

NOTES ON WOMAN'S PROGRESS

....THE THEORY has been advanced that married women go forth from their homes to work simply in order to have better clothes and more theatre and opera tickets than their husbands can supply. This theory is bitterly resented by those of this large class who have been interviewed by the New York Sun. They insist that nothing but grim need drives a woman with a husband and children from her home to work from eight to ten hours for an exacting employer—often under most uncomfortable circumstances of light, heat and position. In a certain large store, the married women applying for work have greatly increased in numbers during the past two years. Nearly all come because their husbands are unemployed. It is said to be easier now for a woman than for a man to get work. The laws governing the work of woman are made by men. Since she is more and more obliged to enter the commercial and professional world, it is only just and right that she should have a voice in the making of the laws controlling that world.

....MASS MEETINGS are being conducted throughout New York State in the interest of suffrage, and the enthusiasm has been greater than ever before. Among the speakers at these meetings have been Mrs. Crossett, the honored state president; Mrs. Florence Kelly, who pleads so eloquently for the ballot as a protection to the woman worker; Miss Shaw, the national president, one of the keenest and most logical speakers that the cause has ever known; and Mrs. Henry Villard, the daughter of William Lloyd Garrison, whose gentle face and distinction of manner carry a strong influence wherever she appears. Mrs. Elizabeth Churchill, the first woman member of a school board in the state and a warm friend of Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony, has been an interesting figure in these great meetings. Several young women graduates of Cornell University have made bright and witty speeches. Prominent ministers have, in several cities, introduced the speakers and have strongly supported the work. They understand clearly that nothing will help the church, the school and the causes of temperance and social reform, like the vote in the hands of women.

....MADAME PICHON-LANDRY, of Paris, has originated a movement there for the passage of a law requiring every married man to give his wife half of his wages. Her argument is this: The work of a man is possible only when his clothes are mended, his bed made, his food prepared, and his children brought up by his wife. If he had to do this labor, in addition to his regular business, his gains would be greatly diminished. Woman's work, therefore, is the condition sine qua non of man's professional success. In other words, the man receives wages for the work of two. Since this domestic activity has such value, why should it be the only work that receives no remuneration?" Mme. Pichon-Landry belongs to the younger and more moderate party of the French suffragists. She deplores the violence of the older section, and feels that the ends in view are to be best attained by appeals to the reason and the sense of justice of good men.

....TOO MUCH praise cannot be given to the manner in which the suffrage leaders in New York State have approached the Legislature, in their efforts to have the word "male" stricken from the State Constitution. They have won the respect of all who have studied their methods; the accusation of "lobbying," which has been sometimes brought against them by those who are inimical to the cause, is most undeserved. Forty thousand women are members of the New York State Suffrage Association. All classes are included in this vast enrolment—the quiet home-keeper and philanthropist, the social leader, the college professor, the doctor, the lawyer, the teacher, and a great army of other industrial workers. An entire house in Albany has been taken by the association, and placed in charge of Miss Williams, of Weedsport, and Miss Mills, of Syracuse.

Oatmeal flavor
How secured

Every woman in the land knows that the flavor of cooked food is made or destroyed in the cooking.

The flavor of oatmeals is secured in their preparation; not the cooking in the home, but the preparation at the mill.

Take a dish of Quaker Oats and a dish of any other oatmeal cooked by your own hand in exactly the same way; taste one and then the other; there's no comparison; the Quaker Oats has a rich, wholesome, appetizing flavor that makes you want more. Why is this? It's because the men who roast and roll Quaker Oats have learned how through years of experience, and their secrets and processes are controlled exclusively by The Quaker Oats Company.

Poor Rich and Rich Poor*

THE confusion of mind throughout all the ages has been very great concerning true riches. There is doubt whether the advance of civilization has to any considerable degree cleared this confusion; and it is said (we believe by pessimists only) that America, in many respects the most enterprising nation in the world, is upon this issue the most hopelessly confused of all.

And yet an army of preachers are preaching; writers are writing; philosophers are reasoning, and singers are singing about "the simple life."

One can scarcely enter a home in which an illuminated card does not confront him, bearing some such motto as Channing's "Symphony" or Hyde's "Creed"; or some similar expression from Emerson, or Van Dyke, or Booker Washington. The chief leaders of public opinion are evidently trying to reach and teach the ideal of love and humility and service; but the scramble after pelf makes the most show, and therefore some think that it is representative and universal.

Such observers sometimes say that it is because we do not have wars enough, that the dead rot of selfishness is so eating into the marrow of the nation. They affirm—and, alas! they have many of the foremost minds of the past to back them—that only war rouses men out of their mad pursuit of narrow ends, and they beg for war.

In Dr. Jefferson's inspiring sermon on the "New Crusade" he touches on this matter. Yes, he admits, we do need war—but not a war of fists and guns—a war of wit and of principle, of heart and of intellect. In Paul's call to the Roman Church he "does not ask the old city, who has pushed her conquests to every horizon, to lay down her armor, but simply to change it."

"Military phraseology finely fits the forms of great spiritual truths"; and a fight is manfully waging here on behalf of the right ideal of riches.

Examine the careers of the men who have made colossal fortunes in our country. Several have gone to their graves broken-hearted through the sins of their children. Others have been so bitterly attacked, on the ground that their wealth was gained dishonestly, that their lives have been embittered. Others still, like one who has recently died, have lost their health under the tremendous burdens which they were carrying and have dropped in the harness just as they had reached a point where they could enjoy their gains. Several have earned the contempt of the public by the vile use they have made of their money and the moral depths to which they have sunk, under the temptations to which riches always expose men. Almost none have been happy. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter the kingdom of God!"

The prayer of Agur is the one which most of us should offer: "Give me neither poverty nor riches." But our topic seems to indicate that poverty is healthier for the soul than affluence. Lazarus was in heaven. Dives languished in everlasting torment.

The questions to ask, as Dr. Louis Albert Banks tells us in his beautiful sermon upon "Fellowship with Christ," are not, "Has a man conquered the world?" but "Has the world conquered him?" "Have his successes helped him to see God? Have they made him a better citizen, a truer husband, a wiser father, a sweeter Christian? If not, his victories have been defeats."

Even the dullest of us can see this. We do not need that one rise from the dead to tell us so.

Island Missionary Heroes*

ON the great continents, missionaries might sometimes run away and hide when danger and death threatened. On the islands, that was almost impossible. They had to stand and meet their fate. Hemmed in by seas and oceans on every side, often with no boats available, with suspicious and treacherous cannibals on every side—such has been the situation of some of our island missionaries. Dr. Paton's wonderful story shows how narrow were some of his escapes; and one can gather from reading that most thrilling and dramatic of all the missionary annals, something of what others passed through who did not escape, but died alone and nearly unhonored and unsung. Some bereft mother, a few neighbors and schoolmates, knew of the brave young heart that ceased to beat under the barbarous blows of some savage, but the world swept on with scarcely a ripple.

Probably for every missionary that has lived to labor ten years in his chosen field a score or more have perished before the new language and customs have been fully acquired.

Dr. A. T. Pierson deplores the folly which so often sent off into unknown wilds these armies of devoted and gifted men, without examining them physically and fortifying them with the knowledge of their own constitutions and the climatic and other conditions of the various countries to which they were accredited. In many cases, a man of tuberculous tendency was sent to a country where consumption prevailed, and so on; or men lacking in the necessary strength were permitted to go, only to fall by the way in a short time. They were often careless in drinking the native water and eating new and indigestible foods.

Dr. Pierson calls the missionary deaths during the first few years of the movement largely a record of unnecessary sacrifices.

Life among the heathen is not highly valued at the best. Even in the Philippines, where so-called civilization has existed for ages, half the children die before the age of five years. One reason why we hear of the awful destruction wrought by epidemics in these places is because the people are weak and more or less ailing a large part of the time.

This fact has much more to do with the matter than has that other which is often made to account for the awful havoc, viz., that foreign diseases are peculiarly fatal to natives; as when, with a population of only about 150,000 souls, the measles, introduced by traders, took off 40,000 of them.

Any sort of plague works equal decimation. They cannot stand sickness, and they cannot fight it as we do, with our hospitals and trained nurses.

The work in the Philippines, as well as in many other island fields, is rendered much more difficult by the dialects which divide the people. "A missionary learns Pampangan," says Dr. Devins, "but he finds that a majority of his people speak Ilocano. There is a Panayan Visayan and a Cebuan Visayan. Even Tagalog is not understood in many of the provinces."

One missionary visited a group of Pacific islands early in this century and found them speaking substantially one language. Thirty years later, many dialects prevailed, so that the islands most distant from each other had few words in common.

Among the names of the island missionaries, those of Alexander and Armstrong, those sainted workers for the salvation of the Hawaiians, shine among the brightest. Read their lives. They are like a new Gospel.

Little Annie's Odd Question

By Lucy Rider Meyer

"WILL there be any—will there be any mo' dinner to-day?" Four-year-old Annie, fairly palpitating with shyness and anxiety, was trying to get out the question. A vital question it must have been to her, for her dark eyes shone with excitement and the thin face seemed paler and thinner than ever.

"Will there be any more what, dear?" said the deaconess kindly. This little girl, cruelly neglected, had been brought away from a city slum, and was spending her first day in the refuge among the pines, the Invalid Children's Home.

"Will there be any mo' dinner to-day?"

It was just after breakfast, but all the meals were "dinner" to the half-starved child.

"Oh, are you hungry?" asked Miss Hale.

"No'm—yes, ma'am."

It did not seem possible, but the deaconess had been surprised before at the amount of food it takes to satisfy a newly-arrived child, so she brought a glass of milk. But the child could not drink it—only a swallow. She was literally full. Then the deaconess remembered the hearty breakfast the child had eaten.

But the anxious inquiry, "Will there be any mo' dinner to-day?" came again from Annie after the noon meal. Then Miss Hale remembered that she had heard that it takes a week, sometimes, for the chronically hungry child of the slums to admit that he is not hungry, even though he cannot swallow another crumb. His experience has always been to be hungry, and to realize and admit any other condition requires a readjustment of his entire mental machinery.

As Annie was being put to bed that night the shy little question was again asked, "Will there be any mo' dinner to-morrow?" The deaconess questioned the child, and the explanation came at once. In her home in the city, if home it be called, "dinner" or something to eat, came usually but once a day only, and sometimes whole days passed with absolutely nothing to eat.

"I don't mind the starving men and women so much," said the deaconess, in telling the story, "for I know they are often themselves to blame for their poverty. But the starving children!" and her voice broke. "Poor little things! And there are homes in this country where the very cats are fed cream!"

The Invalid Children's Home, at Verbank, N. Y., has rescued many a child from actual physical starvation. Indeed, it is hardly too much to say that the majority of its fifty children have been starved at some time, for malnutrition lies at the root of most of the diseases from which they suffer.

But there is something worse than physical neglect and starvation. A little boy was brought to the Home recently, having been rescued from the most fearful moral surroundings. His body was black and blue from blows his stepfather had inflicted, and the marks of the man's fingers were on the child's throat. But worse, when this little lad wanted to play with the other children they drew away in horror.

"Why don't you play with Eddie?" said Miss Hale, reprovingly.

"Oh, we can't. He curses awful!"

It was true, the child's language was too profane for endurance. But was he to blame? He had never heard any other kind of talk. He had been growing up starved and deformed morally, a condition a thousand times more pitiable than mere physical starvation, because the results, unchecked, would last forever.

Under the loving teaching of the deaconess, this child is growing pure and good. The black bruises are leaving his body and the sin-stains his soul. Is not such work as this the Lord's work? Is it not what Jesus would have his people do? You can't do it with your own hands, dear friend who read these words, but won't you make use of deaconess hands and help them to do the work?

They are in sore straits just now. Money for the many necessaries of life is sorely needed. The deaconesses can carry on their blessed work only as God's children stand behind them with support. If you are interested, write to Florence Mahin, treasurer, Home for Invalid Children, Verbank, N. Y.

Called Higher

Mrs. Edith C. Doty died at her home in Pembroke Shore, Nova Scotia, November 12, 1908, aged eighty-four years.

Mrs. Sprague, mother of E. F. Sprague, of Minneapolis, Minn., was recently called to her eternal home. She was a member of the United Presbyterian Church.

Mrs. Pleas Cook, of Nicholasville, Ky., entered into rest January 12, 1909. She was a member of the Baptist Church, and a devoted reader of The Christian Herald, speaking of it as her paper.

Mrs. C. A. Benson, of Bone Gap, Ill., was called higher May 29, at the age of ninety-one years. She often helped this paper in its works of charity, and was a subscriber to The Christian Herald almost from its start.

Mrs. Catherine Johnson, of Cedar Rapids, Ia., was called very suddenly into the presence of her King, February 1, 1909, in her eighty-first year. For many years she was an invalid, patient to the last. She had been a reader of The Christian Herald many years, prized it most highly and was always interested in the work of reform and helpfulness for which it stands.

CREATION DAYS

By John W. McKay, Elphinstone, Manitoba, Can.

ARE these short, ordinary days, or long geologic periods? I am inclined to say neither—so far as the original word can determine. To my mind, the original word used in Genesis may be a generic term, and as such indicating nothing as to duration, and yet possessing the strange characteristic of being able to represent any length of time—say from an hour up, even to eternal years. In this respect it resembles somewhat the words "time" and "age." We speak, for instance, of dinner time and time as infinite. We talk of the age of a child two days old, and also of the age of the Laurentian rocks. Nevertheless, the terms "time" and "age" do not, of themselves, point out anything as regards duration. It is not their office to indicate measurement.

What is a generic term? As a good illustration take the Hebrew sus, a horse. This word really means a runner; and as such is applicable to a great number of objects. And accordingly we find it in Greek and Latin as the name for the wild boar; and in Sanscrit it means a rabbit—all good runners, of course. Take, also, the word "stars," as found in the sentence, "He made the stars also." The original word means shiners, and as such would be applicable as a name for stars, whether science should find them to be immense globes or mere tapers only.

The following facts are worthy of notice and have a bearing on the subject of "days." First, it is a common custom in all languages, and so particularly in Hebrew, to name objects after some general feature which they represent. The two words referred to above are interesting instances. Second, the word, in the Ojibway dialect, for "day" means the bright thing, and as such is fitted to stand for any short period, or for an eternity of years. Third, the same is true of another different word employed by the Slavy Indians. The two terms are, of course, generic. Fourth, the Latin dies, a "day," is also generic, and means the bright thing, the root being a Sanscrit word, to shine. Fifth, the Gaelic word is lath, seemingly connected with the Latin lata, wide or extended. We speak of a "stretch of time." Sixth, the Gaelic om, a season, is also generic, and is, in all likelihood, the very word (yom) which Hebrew employs for "day." It can hardly be otherwise, since both words sound so much alike, and both represent the idea of duration. Seventh, though ahan stands in Sanscrit for a specific "day," it seems to be the same term which, in Greek, Arabic and Gaelic, appears with a generic import, and in the forms of aion, un and uine.

The foregoing are remarkable facts; yet equally remarkable is the fact that even our English term "day" is generic, and as such refuses to be tied down to any particular length of time. For we have a day in Jupiter which is only five hours in length, while at the poles a day lasts for months; and we talk even of the brightness of an eternal day.

In view, then, of these considerations there is nothing unnatural in supposing that the Hebrew word employed by Moses is, or at least may be, of generic import, bearing within it some such idea as that of something bright, or warm, or genial; and nothing unnatural in supposing that inspiration revealed nothing to him as to the measurement of his periods, and gave no instruction to affirm anything on that point.

Moses evidently knew nothing of the size of stars, as the context shows. It seems to have pleased the Creator to leave the matter of star measurement to the labors of a future astronomy. And in like manner to the labors of a sister science (geology) may have been assigned the task of determining the measurement of creation days.

A Book of Facts About 6% Irrigation Bonds

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds, based on 15 years of experience. It is a conservative statement of the vital facts of which we have intimate knowledge.

It will give you a clear conception of these ideal securities, which are now the most popular bonds that we handle.

Every investor, small or large, owes to himself a knowledge of these facts. Please send for the book—it is free.

An Unbiased Book

We are very large dealers in all good classes of bonds—Municipal, Corporation and Public Utility. We can offer you the choice of scores of such issues, and we just as gladly supply them as we do Irrigation bonds. So our position is not at all biased.

But Irrigation bonds have in late years become the most popular bonds that we handle. They are becoming more popular as they become better known. The reasons mean much to every investor, and they are all told in this book.

71 Issues Sold

In the past 15 years we have sold 71 separate issues of Reclamation bonds—Drainage and Irrigation—without a dollar of loss to any investor. We are now the largest dealers in this class of bonds, so our book is based on ample experience.

We buy and sell Entire Issues of Reclamation bonds. Our own engineers and attorneys pass on every detail. An officer of our Company spends most of his time in the irrigated country, watching every project through to completion.

Being the largest dealers in Irrigation bonds, we have our pick of the issues. There are few projects of this kind, save Government projects, which we are not invited to finance. We are able, therefore, to supply our customers with the best of these securities, all based on well-located lands.

Farm Lien Security

Irrigation bonds are secured by first liens on the most fertile farm lands in America. The liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. And the water immediately multiplies the land's value.

The liens are conservative. Usually they will not exceed one-fourth the land's value. The liens are paid off in ten annual installments.

The first crop from the land is frequently sufficient to pay the whole lien—often by several times over. These liens, therefore, have many advantages over the usual farm mortgage.

In addition, the bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns, and which the proceeds of the bonds help to build and buy.

Some Irrigation bonds are municipal securities, issued by organized districts. Such bonds, like School bonds, form a tax lien on all the real property lying in populous districts.

Some Irrigation bonds are issued under all the provisions of the Federal law known as the "Carey Act."

In all the projects we finance the security is ample and ideal. One can scarcely conceive of anything better.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent. interest. This is a larger rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

This high rate is due to the fact that irrigation projects are profitable. The demand for irrigated land exceeds the supply. Many millions of dollars can be utilized at once in these projects, and this liberal rate is paid to obtain the funds.

$100—$500—$1,000

These are serial bonds, running from two to twelve years. So one may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

The bonds are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

PAUL'S PERILOUS VOYAGE

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THREE times Paul had suffered shipwreck, and a night and a day he had been in the midst of the sea; but it was now as a state prisoner that he traveled. God had a further purpose to serve; it was to make an entrance in Rome, then the most powerful city of the world, for the Gospel of Christ. Paul was always an honored prisoner. There is no doubt that God had blessed messages for the brethren of Sidon through Paul; and they were as much, or more, refreshed than he. Luke and Aristarchus took passage in the same ship with Paul, probably at their own expense; and Julius, the centurion, seems in no way to have objected to their accompanying him.

The intended course of the vessel was close to the coasts of Asia. To sail close to shore was the ordinary navigation of those days, in which striking out to sea was generally thought too dangerous. But contrary winds caused them instead to sail under Cyprus, from whence they sailed to Myra on the south coast of Asia Minor, where they changed ships, because the centurion found there a ship of Alexandria sailing into Italy. Sailing in those days was no easy task. It was only by the stars at night, when it was clear, that the captain of a vessel could ascertain the direction the ship was taking. In cloudy nights or fogs, and during the day when the sun was hidden, he had no guide. They sailed slowly many days, the wind against them, and then at last sailed under Crete, over against Salmone, and later on to a place called The Fair Havens, near to the city of Lasea. How long this part of the voyage took we know not. The tour of the world is made now in far less time than it took Paul to get from Cæsarea to Rome. Were all his journeys thus tedious? Far from it. But now God had a purpose of mercy to those who sailed with Paul, and also to some needy ones whom he would meet with on his journey. In those infant days of navigation, it was madness to set sail just at the time of year when much wind and storm might be expected. Such it was at this time, and Paul said unto them, "Sirs, I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives." The centurion would argue, "Of course the master and owner of the vessel will run no dangerous risk with the property in which his capital is sunk. And, after all, this Paul may have an interested motive in wanting to remain in this incommodious haven." How few men really believe in God's over-ruling of weather, of seasons, of any of the natural laws which he has constituted, and which are kept in force by him!

A soft south wind encouraged the sailors to think they had obtained their purpose, so that they set sail close by the coast, when "there arose against it a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon." Paul's prediction began to be accomplished. The sailors lost all control of the ship. With great difficulty they let down the boat and undergirded the vessel, fearing, doubtless, she would go to pieces. They were driven at the mercy of the wind. To better matters, part of the cargo was cast into the sea; and finally the tackling. Still, all looked very dark; the tempest continued to rage day and night. All hope in man, all hope in navigation, all hope in master and owner of the ship gone! What was Paul doing in this time of trial? He had been asking of God a great thing, the lives—probably the souls and bodies—of all those who were in the ship. And God had answered him.

For his own safety, Paul had no fear; he knew God's purpose regarding him; but he knew it was no accident which had shut him up in the ship with his fellow-passengers in this time of trial. So Paul dealt with God about them.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Seven Days in Spirit Garb. By W. H. Dunseth. 85 cents. Pittsburg Printing Company. A temperance story, in which the good and bad spirits which hover around us are supposed to be seen, and their wiles and conflicts are described.

Nephilim. By William J. H. Bohannan. "Nephilim," says the author, "is not a defense, nor an apology, for the Bible; but it is war, and war carried into the very camp of the scientists and philosophers, who have been firing crude ammunition at the Bible." Cloth covers. Pp. 236. Price $1.50. Reeve A. Silk, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, publisher.

High Priesthood and Sacrifice. By William Porcher Du Bose, M.A., S.T.D., professor of Exegesis, University of the South. A book to be welcomed by the devout Bible student. A clear, concise, learned, yet devotional exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Price $1.50. Longmans, Green & Co., New York and London, publishers.

Harmony and Ear Training. By Professor William Alfred White. A musical work which students will welcome. In a series of progressive exercises it covers the whole range of modulation, minor and major scales, key relationship, intervals, melodic formation, and harmonic and melodic progression. Pp. 207. Price $1.50. Silver, Burdett & Co., New York, Boston and Chicago, publishers.

Some Reminiscences. By William L. Royall. New York: The Neale Publishing Company. $1.50. Mr. Royall was a grand-nephew of Chief Justice Marshall, and himself became a lawyer. He fought in the Civil War, on the Confederate side, and suffered in Northern prisons, which he considers hardly better than Andersonville and Libby. Those interested in the politics of Reconstruction days will find much of it in this book.

The Substitute. A Football Story. By Walter Camp. $1.50. D. Appleton & Co., New York. If any one can make the brutal game of football appear innocent and even improving it is Mr. Camp. He has laid the scene of his story at Yale, and has interwoven certain ideals of scholarship and ethics into it, though they are decidedly overshadowed by the idol of athletics, which bestrides the modern university like a very colossus.

Journeys of the Kit-Kat Club in England. By William R. A. Wilson. It is refreshing to find that again authors and publishers have turned their attention to books of this kind for young people. History and description of life and customs in England are given in a most attractive form. The profuse illustrations add much to the text. While books of travel for older readers have perhaps been overdone, they have not for the younger generations. Pp. 388. Price $2. D. Appleton & Co., New York, publishers.

Are You Well?
Have You a Good Figure?

You can surprise your husband and friends by giving 15 minutes a day, in your room, to special directions which I give you to strengthen vital organs and nerves, so you are relieved of chronic ailments. Your body can be rounded and you can have as good a figure, as gracefully carried, as any woman of your acquaintance.

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can t tell you how happy I am! I wore low neck and short sleeves the other night and I was so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. You remember I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. I guess my stomach must be stronger too, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel as if I had missed so much enjoyment in life, for I never did have such good times before. I feel so well all the time."

I have built up thousands of women why not you? Write me, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so.

I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands.

Historical Romances

At Less than Half Price to Christian Herald Readers

THESE WONDERFUL HISTORICAL ROMANCES carry the reader into palace and hovel, camp and boudoir, and unveil the glance of coquetry that stayed the march of armies, or the vaulting ambition that changed the destiny of nations. You see and feel how love, hope, avarice, ambition, jealousy, and intrigue entered into the lives of men and women and changed the course of empires. Napoleon divorcing the Empress Josephine, the only woman he ever loved, and marrying the daughter of the hated Austrians, that he might found a dynasty and bring to pass his dreams of universal empire, is only one of the many thousands of tragic events so full of passion and tears, of sacrifice and achievement. These romances form a theme such as never before employed an author's pen, and Muhlbach performed the task with a literary skill and loving fidelity that has never been surpassed. No fiction, no drama can compare with these wonderful romances, and you will find them not only fascinating and intensely interesting, but reliable and truthful as well. MAIL THE COUPON BELOW FOR FREE EXAMINATION IN YOUR OWN HOME.

YOU SHOULD HAVE these fascinating volumes of Muhlbach, because they will bring you a wealth of charming hours. Read the delightful pages that tell of rare, old, fragrant love stories of "fair women and brave men" of Long Ago; of the stirring battles of Frederick the Great and his resistless soldiers; of the "love that lies in woman's eyes," whether in the marbled courts of Queen Hortense and Empress Josephine or in the liberty-loving huts of Andreas Hofer and his Tyrolean fighters; of the scarlet gleam of the French Revolution, the gay laughter of noble ladies, the flights, elopements, abductions, the roar of approaching mobs, and the rumbling prison carts, and the tragic ride of Marie Antoinette to the guillotine. All this you'll find in these enchanting pages, rich in the splendor of courts, the clash of battle, and the pulsating heart-throbs of many of the most dashing men and the most lovely women of all history. The Encyclopedia Britannica says: "Muhlbach's power in weaving alluring romances from these stirring times is unsurpassed. These wonderful Historical Romances show a talent for lively description and narration that gives them enduring popularity."

American Boy

Biggest, brightest and best magazine for boys in all the world. You need never worry about your boy's company when he is chumming with The American Boy. It is the greatest adjunct to refined home training. Wins every boy's confidence and enthusiasm. Bright, breezy stories of adventure, travel, history, biography and world events, beautifully illustrated. Proper amount of sports and games, and practical departments of photography, electricity, stamps, curios, carpentry, mechanics, how to do things, how to make things. Is doing more for the healthy entertainment and uplift of boys than any other single influence. Has the enthusiastic support of over 250,000 boys, and their parents thoroughly respect it for the good it does their boys. Give your boy a magazine of his own.

American Magazine

Is selected by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this year as one of the leaders in its club offers because of the illustrious group of writers announced for the coming year. F. P. Dunne ("Mr. Dooley"), Ida M. Tarbell, William Allen White, Samuel Hopkins Adams, William J. Locke, May Sinclair, Stewart Edward White, Ray Stannard Baker and O. Henry are a few among the many. Every number of The American Magazine contains the best that can be gotten from the pens of the greatest writers—literature that lives and breathes and spurs to better living—illustrations that are true to life and nature. It is a new magazine in every sense—new writers, new subjects, new artists and new fiction—and an appeal to the mind and heart that is new in periodical literature.

Cosmopolitan

Cosmopolitan Magazine is the one great magazine of all the great national monthlies. No matter how many magazines you take, Cosmopolitan is the one you cannot afford to do without. Its subscribers of last year are subscribers this year—with their friends. This, after all, is the real test of a magazine's merit—that its readers tell their friends about it. You can be sure that in 1910 one feature in each issue will be of such universal interest as to dominate the magazine world for that month. As single instances, take Cosmopolitan's great series of brilliant short stories by George Randolph Chester, or the intensely interesting adventure story by E. Phillips Oppenheim. "The best, no matter what it costs" is the motto which makes Cosmopolitan resemble no other magazine but Cosmopolitan.

Good Housekeeping

Good Housekeeping Magazine is a richly illustrated monthly, the one magazine which has popularized household science and home-making in a broad sense. It is the most practical of the household magazines, and at the same time one of the brightest and most refreshing of periodicals for general reading, its fiction and discussions of current issues being particularly good. It is an all-around family magazine, which renders home-making a pleasure. How to secure the most and the best for the money in home furnishing and equipment, and in food supply, is among its specialities. Its greatly enlarged Household Experiment Station, Model Kitchen and Testing Room of household appliances is a national institution. Special attention is given to health, to children, to needlework, and stenciling.

Harper's Bazar

Beginning with the Christmas number of 1909, Harper's Bazar goes into its superb new, enlarged and improved form. It will be bigger than ever before. It will be better than ever before. It will be more interesting than ever before. It will be more helpful than ever before. It will be indispensable to every thoughtful woman whose ambition is to make the most of life for herself and for her family. It will "set the fashion." It will continue to be the supreme authority on questions of good form, household decoration, entertainment, and practical and domestic topics of every kind. It will have the best short stories, the best pictures, the best essays, the best poems to be found in any woman's magazine.

For Home Reading or for Holiday Gifts

Search wherever you may, you will never find anything that, at the price, gives greater and more genuine satisfaction as a gift than a weekly or monthly magazine, which the whole year through reminds the recipient of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

Little Folks

A beautifully illustrated monthly magazine for children from three to thirteen. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunshiny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and, above all, true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also playwork for little fingers.

McClure's Magazine

Mr. S. S. McClure, editor of McClure's Magazine, is one of the greatest magazine editors in America and a man of national reputation. Speaking of McClure's Magazine, he said recently: "I shall continue to spend more and more money—to give my readers a better and better magazine. McClure's Magazine for the next year will be more intensely interesting, and will exert a more potent influence on American life than any other magazine. It will be the best twelve numbers of any magazine in America." McClure's is always a step in advance of other magazines. Besides the articles on government, politics, people and things, McClure's is also famous for its fiction. The coming numbers will make new history for McClure's. You'll want them surely.

Pearson's Magazine

One-half is for information on subjects in which you are interested; that means home subjects, the things that American people are thinking and talking about. Once in a while some foreign matter may be discussed, but only in its relation to Americans and only when it means something to America. During the coming year informative articles on subjects which mean something to the average man will be written, in every case by the writer best qualified for the matter. The other half of the magazine is for entertainment, purely and simply. Pearson's Magazine is famous in two hemispheres for its fiction. It gets the best that is written. There is a continual and urgent demand from the newspapers for Pearson's stories. Do you want this sort of a magazine?

Review of Reviews

Fifty Magazines Condensed—More Necessary Than Ever.

In a single number of The Review of Reviews there are sixty topics, every one of real, immediate interest to every intelligent man and woman, discussed and interpreted by Dr. Albert Shaw, his staff, and his contributors; there are one hundred pictures that really illustrate and inform, including the cartoon department, which amuses into the bargain; there are fifty magazines and leading articles skilfully condensed, and scores of the new books reviewed. "The Review of Reviews is a liberal education," is the way one eminent subscriber sums it up. The more things that happen—the more magazines there are—the more indispensable is The Review of Reviews. Busy men and women want it, need it, read it. Why not you?

Woman's Home Companion

The greater Woman's Home Companion will be the most interesting, the most useful and the most beautiful woman's magazine published. There will be fiction by Anna Katherine Green, Juliet Wilhur Tompkins, Anne Warner, Myra Kelly, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and a host of others. There will be special articles no woman will want to miss. With nearly a score of different practical departments for women Woman's Home Companion can promise the most useful woman's magazine in the world. In short, The Companion will have more stories than the fiction magazines, more pictures than the picture magazines, and more practical departments than any other magazine.

World Evangel

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are Sunday School teachers or scholars should not fail to include The World Evangel in their combination magazine orders. The Evangel is the leading Sunday School magazine. It makes teaching delightful and effective, its fund of anecdotes enabling the teacher to interest scholars of all grades. Its lesson study department provid the best available exposition and information, and its lesson-teaching department is divided into Adult, Intermediate and Primary Departments, including comment on Primary Graded Lessons. The Superintendent's Department is most practical. In addition to the lesson comment, by six specialists, it presents the most successful methods and news. The Evangel will save time and increase your efficiency.

World To-day (The)

The one magazine indispensable to every home. A world review, furnishing monthly not only a complete digest of events, but many attractive articles on timely subjects, by noted contributors. In it you will find events, religion, travel, science, invention, art, drama, literature, education, etc., treated in a popular way, affording recreation for the idle hour, and, best of all, something worth while. In illustration it is a regular panorama of the world—many of the pictures being in colors. The World To-Day is really a $3 magazine for but $1.50. It is clean, healthful and inspiring—just right for Christian readers. Its remarkable quality and low price make it an exceptional bargain. It has proven one of our most popular publications, and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

ARGENTINA'S CENTENNIAL YEAR

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

AMONG the South American countries which will celebrate the hundredth birthday of their independence in 1910 is the Argentine Republic. The formal commemoration will be observed by expositions, both national and international, and there will also be various observances to perpetuate the memories of the struggle against Spain. But a century leaves no animosity. Argentina is still peopled by the descendants of the early Spaniards, and among the monuments to be erected is one to Spain.

Argentina has much that makes it of interest to the people of the United States. In the first place, there is its size. While not as big as our own country, it has more than 1,200,000 square miles of territory.

Then there is a similarity of products, in which it compares to our own Mississippi Valley. It is one of the greatest wheat growing regions in the world, with unlimited possibilities for future crops. One of the homelike sights that an American sees in Argentina is the big steam threshers in harvest time. Most of these threshers, too, are of American make, as are nearly all the mowers and reapers.

Argentina has cattle ranches and sheep ranches which compare with those of Texas and Montana. Its beef and mutton help to feed a good many people in England and in other parts of the world, while its wool clip is woven into cloths by the weavers of England and Germany.

The history of the struggle which resulted in Argentina securing its independence is one of the most thrilling of the chapters in the revolt of the South American colonies from Spain. This struggle produced some heroic figures. The greatest of them was General San Martin. He not only helped to free the disconnected territories or provinces which constituted Argentina and to unite them, but he also bore a supreme part in the emancipation of other sections of South America. His feats in leading the troops through the snow-covered passes of the Andes and down to the plains of Chile are unsurpassed in military annals. They scaled snow-clad peaks and cleared pathways that it was declared no human feet could tread. San Martin led the victorious army in the Pacific Coast countries till his meeting with General Bolivar, the liberator. They were the two great military spirits, and it was felt certain that their rival ambitions would clash. But sooner than endanger the liberties of the newly-enfranchised republic San Martin, who was the more generous of the two, after an interview with Bolivar, returned to Buenos Ayres. There he met the obstacles that constructive statesmen often meet in trying to reconcile and consolidate discordant local interests. He became a voluntary exile, and died at Boulogne, in France. One of the features of the Centennial celebration is to be the erection of a monument to him at Boulogne.

Another hero of the Argentine struggle was General Belgrano, who was second only to San Martin. A magnificent mausoleum holds his remains.

The seat of the Argentine declaration of independence was not at Buenos Ayres, or in the seacoast provinces, but far up in the northern interior, at a place called Tucuman. This is the Philadelphia of the Argentine Republic. On visiting it, some years ago, I found many interesting memorials of the declaration and of the Congress which sat there. Tucuman is now a thriving city, a railroad centre and the distributing point for a rich agricultural region.

Along the Water Front of Buenos Ayres

While the plans for the Centennial, as provided for by the Argentine Congress last winter, contemplate the erection of many statues and monuments in the city of Buenos Ayres, these memorials are not to be limited to the capital. There are plans for the erection of graded schools in La Plata, Corrientes, Santa Fé, and other provincial capitals. This is in line with the educational policy which, for more than forty years, has been a leading feature in the progress of the country. It is due to Sarmiento, the schoolmaster president, who lived in the United States as a young man and was the close friend of Horace Mann and other noted educators. He established the astronomical observatory at Cordoba, the ancient seat of learning and the home of the university that still exists. American professors have been in charge of the observatory for many years. President Sarmiento also brought school teachers from New England, who had a very great influence in moulding and developing the school system. A few years ago one of these teachers, a New England woman, died after many years of service. She was shown funeral honors by the government such as are accorded to high public officials.

Further evidence of the practical side of the Centennial will be afforded by the various expositions. These include an exposition of fine arts, an agricultural exposition and an exposition of transportation. The latter will be chiefly a railway exhibit. This is fitting because it is the railways which have made Argentina what it is, and which will make it a much greater country in the future. So much of the country is flat and level that railway building has no more difficulties than on our western prairies, except when the foothills of the Andes are reached.

Argentina is a very hospitable country to foreigners. The language is Spanish and, as I have stated, the country is peopled by the Spanish race. But there is a very large admixture of other races, particularly from the Latin countries of Europe.

In the great city of Buenos Ayres, which now has a population of 1,200,000, there are said to be between 300,000 and 400,000 Italians. The Italians are also scattered throughout the country. There is a large German colony in Buenos Ayres, with German schools, a Lutheran Church, and various societies, which remind one very much of the home life in the Fatherland. These races are doing much to develop the country.

The English-speaking colony is pretty large, and is growing all the time. There are several churches, the best known of which is the Methodist, of which Dr. McLaughlin is the pastor. It is still known as the American Church, but many English people attend it.

Out in the country there are a good many Irish and English farmers, and down in the southern section, in what the geographies used to call Patagonia, many Scotchmen are engaged in raising sheep. There is also a very prosperous Welsh colony, which has its annual eisteddfod, or song festival. And away up in the north, at Tucuman, there is a Swiss colony, which has its sharpshooters' festival, when the deeds of William Tell are recounted, and sometimes repeated. So one can see what a thoroughly cosmopolitan country the Argentine Republic is.

A SERMON IN WORDS OF ONE SYLLABLE BY

LIGHT, LIFE, LOVE

TEXTS: John 1:4—"In him was life; and the life was the light of men." I. John 1:5—"God is light." I. John 4:8—"God is love."

"GOD is light." "God is life." "God is love." What short words are these! St. John seems to have been a man who had a love for short words. Yes, but these are deep words. I think words more deep than these no man could speak. In fact, here are depths where all our thoughts are drowned. Here are truths so vast, so high, so deep, that no man can take in all they mean. Still, it may be well for us to have a glimpse of what they mean, for that will make us more fit to know their full truth by and by, when this life that we live now will give place to the life to come.

I. Let us think, in the first place, of this great truth: "God is light." First, we think of this, that God must have been Light, else he could not have made the worlds. I say the worlds, for there are more worlds than ours. In fact, this world is a small world—a mere point in space. Look at the sun. The earth is not much more than a speck when we think of him. And there are worlds of far more bulk than ours, that swing round the sun as we do.

But I ask you to think just now of the vast light that must come from the sun to light up all the worlds that move round him. For he does give light to them all. Some of these worlds are far, far off in space; yet the sun gives light to all of them. To show how bright he must be, I may state that some men were made blind by his rays. They looked at the sun through a glass that makes his rays too bright for the eye, and they did not take care, so they were made blind. And we would all be made blind if we had not lids on our eyes to keep out the sun's rays. So bright are these rays that they can be put through a glass and set things on fire.

The Divine Source of Light

Now how did all this light come to be in the sun? And how does it last so long? It did not come there by chance. It must have been put there first by God. How else could it come there? And it is so bright that it has been the light of all these worlds for years and years, that no man can count. But when we know that God is light we can see that he can store some of his light in the sun. All this light must be in God, else he could not put it in the sun. Well might John say, "God is light."

But yet, bright as the sun is, there are suns far more bright than he. In fact, our sun would seem dim if placed near to some of the suns that shine far off in space. Yes, there are suns that no man can count in the far fields of space. Our sun is a long way off, so far that he seems like a mere ball of fire. Yes, but there are suns of far more bulk, and far more bright than he. Now all these suns, large and bright as they are, must have got their light from God. He is the source of it all. If John knew this he might well say that God is Light. That is a truth far too high for us to grasp in full. For we may well think that this Light-God shines through all the worlds that he has made.

Yet it is well for us to think of those worlds, and how large some of them are, and how bright, and how far off in space. The fact is, that if we could fly off through space, the first sun we meet, when we pass our own sun, is of far more bulk than ours and four times as bright. And if we could go on, we would meet a sun two hundred times as bright as ours. And through the whole of space, as far as we can see, there are suns that no man can count, and so bright that our sun seems dark and dim. In fact, our sun is a dim light in one of God's rooms. For the whole of space is God's home, and this vast space where our sun shines is but one small room, and the light of all these suns comes from God.

The Light of His Word

But God is more than the source of all the light of all the suns. He is the source of all mind. Now we all speak of mind as light. We say we have light on a thing when we know what it means. But God is the light of all mind, as he is the light of all the suns. All the light of mind in all men, through all time, came from God. He is the source of it all.

He gives us the light of his Word. Men are made wise by it. The man who wrote most of the Psalms speaks in that way. He says that God's Word gives light. He knew that God spoke to him in that way, and gave him light in his soul. And God speaks to us now through his Word. The Word of God is the light of God. It shines in the mind and in the heart.

But the light of God is not all in his Word. He has been the light of all men through all time, when they had no Word of God. He makes men to know all that they do know. All that men know of life, of their own frame, of growth, of the earth, of the stars, of all things, comes from God. Men do not still think of this, but it is true. God has ways by which he speaks to man's mind when man does not know it. When a man finds out some great thing it may be that he knows that it has come from God. But when a man finds out some small thing, he is apt not to think of God at all. Yet God is in the small thing as well as in the great.

How God Speaks to Men

There was once a great man who tried for long years to find out the laws that rule in the worlds that move round the sun. Now this was a good man, and he saw God in all things. At last he found out the great law he looked for, for he knew there must be a law to make those worlds move so and so, and still in the same way, and keep to the same time. So when he found out the great law he said that he felt that God's thoughts were made to flash in his own mind. For the same thoughts must have been in God's mind when he made those laws as in this man's mind when he found them out. And there are times when great thoughts come to us that we do not look for. At such times we ought to think of God, and that these thoughts are sent to us from his own mind. Of a truth, God must be near when he can thus speak to men.

And God gives light to men at times in trade and art, and such like things, when it may be that they do not know that God spoke to them at all. But some do know. We read in God's Word of a man to whom God gave such light, and showed him how to work in iron, and brass, and wood, and silver, and gold. There was a great need at the time for a man who could do such things for the house of God. But no such man was to be found. All the men had just come out of a land where they had long been slaves. How could they know the way in which to do such fine work? But there was one man of them whom God taught, and a few men who wrought with him. So the work was done, and we think it was done well. Now we see from such a case that God can come to men and teach them. In the case we speak of, no man could be found who could do the work. But God found a man, and taught him.

We may thus see that God speaks to us through his works; for he is in them all, and the source of them all. "All his works praise him." Yes, it is true that "there lives and moves a soul in all things, and that soul is God."

The Glorious Plan of Grace

But now just think of some ways in which God is seen in his works that are close at hand. We do not need to go up to the sun and stars to see him. We may see him there, for he is the light of all the worlds that he has made. But we may see him here in the light of his mind, and that is a light that shines more clear than the light of all the suns.

Just think of the way God has made man, and the means he takes to keep him in life. He made the earth to bring forth just the things that man needs. Think of the power in the soil, which God put in it that it may do this. It could not come by chance. It is God's wise plan. Then think of the plan on which man is made so as to fit him for the world that God had made for him. It took God's mind and God's power to do it. There is plan in all things we see; but there could be no plan if God had no mind. But God is light, and no where do we see this more than in the way he has made man and the things man needs. Things are made to fit where they need to fit. It is all of God. In things that are low, and in things that are high, we see that God's mind runs through all. Just think of one or two things that will show this.

Think of the air. In the main it is of two parts. One part man breathes into his lungs, and his lungs are so made that they take it in; in that way it is made to be his life. Then he breathes out the part that would kill him if he kept it in. All this we know so long that we cease to speak of it. But could there be a proof more clear of plan on the part of God?

Then think of plants. They breathe, too, in their own way. But the air that would kill a man if he did not breathe it out is the life of the plant. Think of man's power to take in the food that God makes for him. Man can make of it flesh and blood, and bone and brain. He does not know how he does it, but it is done. It is God's plan that man should do it, but he knows not how. Thus we might go on at great length to show that God is light. Yes, the light of his mind is seen in all his works.

More than all, God has made us to hope for a new life of joy when this life is done. We have all this hope. It is of God. It springs up in the heart when all things are dark. And God will not cause us to hope in vain. The life we long for he has in store for us. He that has made things to fit so in this world has made for us a home of love and joy when this life is done.

Thus I am led to say that the best way in which we may see the light of God's mind is in his great plan of grace. Here we may see that the mind of God is a great deep. Our race had gone far from God, and it did seem as if there was no way by which we might come back. But there was one way. None but God could have thought of it, and no one but he could have put it in force. But he had the mind to think of it, and the heart to put it in force. It meant no less than that he would give up his Son to death, that so he might save the world. And he did give up his Son. No less than the love of God could do it; but the love of God could do it. And so there was made a way by which man might go back to God.

The Life Eternal

And that is not all. For the Son of God had the same love for men, so that he came to earth and bore the pains and toils of his life, and at last died on the cross; and, more than all, he bore such pain of mind as no tongue can tell. So he came of his own free will, and of his own love for us. Yes, it was of his own love he died. That was the one way by which we could be saved. That will be the song of all God's saints through the years and years that will have no end. Oh, that we may taste and see that the Lord is good! Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor can the heart dream of, the things that God has in store for them that love him.

II. I would ask you to think of the next great truth here: "God is life." What is life? No man can tell. We see what life does; but what life is no man can say. The world is old; wise men have come and gone through all time; but not one of them can tell us what is life; no, not the life of a plant, much less that of a man. And yet such is the pride of man that some have dreamed of late that they can make life, and some have been so blind as to try. No! Man can do great things, but we must draw the line here. God—not man—can make life, and none but he.

I think I may say there are three kinds of life in the world. There is first the life of plants. They grow. Then there is a life, say, of worms. They grow and feel. Then there is the life of man. He grows, and feels, and thinks. In a loose way we may take this as three kinds of life.

Now, God is the source of all kinds of life. No kind of life comes by chance. God gives it. God is life, but life of such a kind that we shall not know it through all the years that have no end. Still, we may know that God is life and that he gives life to all things that live. There may be life in the world to come that is far more pure and high than the best life of man here. But I think it is the same kind of life that we have now, but that it has grown so pure and high. Is it not a great thing to think that the poor life that we live now may rise to so high a pitch in the world to come?

The Father's Boundless Love

So there are many grades of life, from the life of the worm that crawls to the life of man in the world to come. It is a great joy to think that we may rise to that high life, and that we may rise more and more through the years that have no end.

At the same time I am glad that God thought it worth while to make life on a low plane, too. For it makes us think of God in a way that brings him

COLUMBUS DAY CELEBRATED

AMERICA has been celebrating the discovery of the Hudson River, the exploration of the coast by Verrazano, the Florentine sailor, and the invention of a steamboat which went under its own power, yet it has not forgotten the man who made all this possible by discovering the Western land itself—Christopher Columbus. They say that every great man has his day, and the New York Legislature, following the praiseworthy example of several other States, decreed that Columbus should have his day every year—the 12th of October, on which his daring and fortitude might be properly remembered by a grateful people. It was on the 12th of October, 1492, that he first caught sight of land. It seems odd that, despite the great World's Fair at Chicago, the memory of the explorer has been inadequately honored in this country. Several cities have erected monuments, but, with the exception of that in Columbus Circle, in New York City, they are not imposing enough to do justice to the man who, in the face of the opposition and ridicule of his age, persevered in his plans and gave a new world to the human race, to be the future home of one of the greatest nations of the earth.

October 12 was the four hundred and seventeenth birthday of the Western World, and over 20,000 men marched in procession in New York City to celebrate the "First Columbus Day." New York has had a surfeit of parades of all kinds within the last few weeks, but still the people gathered on both sides of Fifth Avenue, from the Washington Arch to Central Park, to see the spectacle. Most of the organizations in line were composed of Italians, who felt they had a stronger claim on this American holiday than any of the others in our patriotic calendar.

The Parade in Honor of Columbus Passing Up Fifth Avenue, New York

The parade was led by a little boy riding on a bicycle about two feet high. He was wrapped about with the green, white and red colors of Italy, and received more applause from the enthusiastic Italian spectators than any one else in the line.

The Italian cruiser Etruria had remained over from the Hudson-Fulton celebration, in order to have its crew take part in the Columbus Day parade, and the sailors acted as a guard of honor to the chief marshal.

One of the marchers who received respectful salutations from all who recognized him was Dr. Robert Sangiovanni, who led the Societa Guardia Emmanuel Vittorio II. The doctor served through all the wars of Garibaldi, and acted as his physician. He is known to his countrymen as one of the bravest Italians in war and one of the most kind-hearted in peace.

The Italian societies of New York have a love for military dress and regalia, and the spectators were able to see practically every uniform worn in sunny Italy since the days of Garibaldi. The statue of Garibaldi stands in Washington Square, and as a number of his red-shirted veterans passed it they saluted reverently. In the line were natty rifle corps, wearing the wide-brimmed and many-feathered cap of the Bersegliere, dismounted cavalry wearing steel helmets with antique crests, so highly polished that they dazzled the eye whenever the sun peeped down behind a cloud to see what all the fuss and feathers was about. There were lancers and dragoons and infantry of the line, all doing their bravest to make a good impression on the people who flocked in from every side street at the ever attractive notes of the bugle, fife and drum.

An interesting feature was the large number of Italian girls, who, dressed in dark skirts, white waists and white sailor caps, made a pretty picture as they followed their band, carrying both American and Italian flags. Flags and banners were displayed in great profusion. Both the art of the needlewoman and of the painter had been lavished on them, and the expense apparently had been the last thing thought of by the military organizations.

The display of flowers in the parade showed that the marchers had come from a land in which the sun shines most of the year and the love of blossoms is implanted in the heart of the youngest child. Flowers were carried by the marchers, and then at the end of the long column of soldiers came carriage after carriage filled with flowers until it looked like some fiesta in southern California. It seemed as if nearly every society which had taken part in the parade had a wagon load of flowers, to be placed on the Columbus monument.

There was a large Santa Maria, the ship in which Columbus sailed, made of flowers, with its companion ships, the Pinta and Niña. At the end of the parade the little floral squadron was placed just under the inscription on the pedestal, which reads:

"Scoffed at before, during the voyage menaced; after it chained, as generous as oppressed, to the world he gave a world."

There was a large egg, made of white flowers, to commemorate the incident where Columbus confounded the shallow wisdom of the counselors by breaking the egg to make it stand on end.

The destination of the parade was the Columbus statue. The statue stands in Columbus Circle, at the southwest entrance to Central Park, and was profusely decorated with flowers and wreaths of honor. The stone figure of the discoverer stands on a high shaft, ornamented with the carved prows of ancient ships.

The parade passed around the monument and halted. Speeches were made and songs were sung, after which the various organizations marched back to their halls for meetings and banquets. A great many business houses closed for the new holiday, and it is expected that next year its observance will be general.

The acting Mayor, who received the marchers at the monument, said in a brief address: "This is a baby holiday, but it is a husky infant, and in time I hope it will take its place in the hearts of all true Americans, next to the Fourth of July.

At the conclusion of the speeches the Circle was the scene of great enthusiasm, the Italians marching about the monument, cheering and singing.

LIGHT, LIFE, LOVE

close to us. When we think that God made the world, and thrones, and powers of the world of bliss, we think of him afar off. But when we see that he loves to make such mean things as cows and dogs and worms, we think of him as near. It is a sweet thought that God can take joy in such low things. It makes us feel that he thinks of us, and that we are dear to him. There is far more joy in this than in all the wealth of the world.

III. Now I make haste to glance at the third thought here: "God's love." We might have put this first. For it ranks first, and it is first in our minds. Yet the thought of mind and the thought of life leads up to the thought of love. Now we think of the great fact that God is love. We would like to say a great deal here, but we draw back. The theme is too great and too high for us. We have no words to set it forth as it ought to be. It is a theme more for thought than for words.

And yet, if we knew all, we might see that light and life and love are kin. It may be that they are all bound up in one. For if God were not light, how could he be love? And if he were not life, how could he be love? The three things seem to blend into one.

We see those wires strung on the street. Now, may I say, to put great things with small, that light, and life, and love, are like light, and power, and heat, all of which come from the one wire. They are one, and yet they are three. So much is this so that we can change the light of the wire to heat or power; we can change the heat of the wire to power or light; we can change the power of the wire to light or heat. Does not this give us a hint of the life, and light, and love that dwell in God? For may we not say that light is like mind, and that heat is like love, and that power that comes from the wire is in a small way like the power of God? It seems to me that we have here a hint, though it be of the earth, of the light, and power, and love of God. But we must not press this hint too far. I have said that it is of the earth. But is it not a great thing that, now and here, we have hints of things that shall be clear by and by?

It is the love of God that we think of now. And it is not that God has love; for then he might have hate as well. No; but it is that God is love. He does hate sin; but he does not hate the worst of men. He is love, and he loves each man that he has made. If men could but know this, and feel it in their hearts, there is no way in which they would so soon be won to God. Hence the main thing which the church has to do is to make the love of God known to the world. For a long, long time, we grieve to say, the church did not do so. She had not heard the call to preach the love of God to the world. But now she hears. In this lies the hope of all the world.

And the chief way in which the love of God is to be made known is, that by his love he gave his own Son to die for the sins of men. Where this love is made known as it ought to be, men will come back to God. May the day come soon when the whole world will know of this love, that is high and deep and broad as our lost race!

It may be that you have at times thought it a strange thing that God should love us so. God, who knows all things, knows all our sin; and sin is the thing which he hates. How, then, can he love us so that he gave his own Son to die for us? I had a hint as to how and why a short time ago. I was in a place of choice flowers. When I had seen them all, the man in charge said there was one flower that he would like me to see. He said he prized it more than all the rest. So he took me to an out-of-the-way place, where there were few flowers, and there he stooped down and scraped up some of the soil. By and by, he brought to light a coarse root. That was the flower he loved so well. It had no charm for me. Then why did he love it so? He knew that by and by, when it would get the sun and rain, it would bloom and be the choice of all his flowers.

And so I thought that is the way that God loves us. It is not so much for what we are now, but for what we may be. He knows the sin that is in us as we do not know it. But he knows, too, what his grace can make of us and what we will be by and by. The sun and rain of his grace can take the worst of men and make them saints. And so we ought to hope for the most vile of men. Think of Saul. He said that none was so vile as he. But God made him Paul the saint—it may be the chief of saints. Well may we say and sing:

O Love Divine! How sweet thou art!
When shall I find my willing heart
All taken up by thee?
I long, I faint, I die to prove
The greatness of redeeming love—
The love of Christ to me.

GOSPEL TRANSLATION IN THE HIMALAYAS

By WM. GREET, Tehri, Landour, Himalayas

PEOPLE seldom realize what a little world of mountain people live, unseen by others, between the plains of India and the confines of Tibet, and less likely to be practically "discovered" than are many in Tibet itself. We tour into a portion of it from the nearest point at which we are allowed to live. We are now translating the Gospel with the object of reaching far beyond where we can go. To do this we have had to forage and ferret, to an extent undreamed of, among people from those parts. The result has been the first portion of our book in a form of language much in advance of what the "pandits" have hitherto accomplished, themselves being the judges. They wonder at the extent of our labor; but, of course, they do not yet understand the importance of the Book, nor what has been done by Him of whom it speaks.

We have, by this Bible-work, been brought into contact with a new class of men. We are engaged with them in the attempt to standardize a language for the whole of Tehri-Garhwal. That is to say, some uniformity of speech is needed for the bulk of the three thousand villages of Tehri-Garhwal and a large portion of the greater area of British Garhwal.

Dialects vary in every five miles or so. Our present task is that of focusing the opinion of the educated pandits of Tehri capital. We have come to know them mainly through Miss Vrooman, the doctor missionary in the Maharajah's household. One pandit is himself making a translation of the whole Gospel in his spare time, and sending it to us for reference. On the language of the Gospel these men are giving their opinion concerning each word. All doctrinal points have to be decided by ourselves. In this the greatest care is needed, especially as the Sanscrit, the common mother of these tongues, is permeated through and through with the speculative philosophy of Hinduism. The distinctly Garhwali word for "son" or "child" has a number of different forms, so only a few would understand if we spoke of the "nauna" of God (i. e., the Son of God).

The Bible has subjects for which even the richest languages have no words, until some words are adapted to the necessary meanings. Such are "Christ," the "Anointed One," who here has no name. The appointing of kings is not by anointing. The word "spirit" is either perverted among the ignorant to mean "body," or taught by the priests as being part of the All-pervading Spirit in the material universe which is His or Its body. We are said to be parts of "It" and to be lost in the great intangible "It" when we have survived the pain of endless separate existences. "Dev" means a god or gods, and we teach that the gods are usurpers of worship and service. The "cross" means absolutely nothing. For "prophet" there is no word, and some of our Hindu friends would have us write "rishi," which is a class believed to hover between earth and heaven for other men's benefit, after having finished their own course of re-births. The resurrection is unknown. "Atonement" is a vast subject, of which they possess something hidden in their sacrifices.

At Work in the Translation Camp

For the name of the Gospel book in Garhwali we are keeping the Hindu word "Susamachar," on the same principle as in English we keep "Bible" rather than "Book." The Nagri character is used. In the text we use the simplest possible form for "good news" (Gospel). Pandita Ramabai has given some valuable help, by which we have been better able to avoid words of Sanscrit origin that are philosophically speculative. Even using the best words available, if we do not explain, the people will not understand. They will think, for instance, that the sin which can never be forgiven in this world or the next is that of speaking against a "holy man," a "fakir" or "sadhu," since the villagers take the word spirit to mean body; and similarly difficult are all texts referring to man's spirit or God's. Hitherto in any attempt to speak of the devil, as in Christ's temptation, only a ghost or an apparition of some kind has been spoken of.

An occasional word seems due concerning the means by which we are supported here in our Tehri Border Village Mission work. We do not often refer to the matter of supplies, except to thank those who have felt led to help. With absolutely no organized arrangements behind us, we have been enabled to work on. And this is not so much that we emphasize differences between the methods of different faith or other missions, as simply that, believing God would have us here, we can only look to him to support us, as his workers, by whom he will. Sometimes strain and even apparent failure is allowed for some reason; but it is noticeable how, year after year, supplies on the whole rise or fall with the need. We know of no explanation for this except that God is in it, and it appears to be his way for us where no society is working.

TEMPERANCE WOMEN MEET IN CONVENTION

By RUTH D. HOAG

THE thirty-sixth annual convention of the New York State Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held in the Armory at Oneonta, N. Y., October 1. There were present 338 delegates, and a large number of visitors. The convention was opened with the president, Mrs. Frances W. Graham, in the chair. Brief addresses of welcome were made by prominent citizens of Oneonta.

Mrs. Cora E. Seberry, national lecturer, pleasingly responded to the words of greeting. The president's annual address was divided into fifteen heads. We note a few: "The Climbing Way," "State Headquarters," "Our Young People," "The White Slave Trade," "Total Abstinence," and "The Spread of the Dry Wave."

The corresponding secretary reported that there had been an increase in membership during the year of 2,475, and, after deducting the losses by death and removal, the net gain was 1,921. Total membership at present in the State, 29,310. The reports given by the superintendents showed active and aggressive work in all lines of endeavor.

Many of the pulpits of the city were filled on Sunday by the evangelists and organizers. In the afternoon there was a large Sunday School rally, participated in by many of the city schools, also a mass meeting addressed by Colonel George W. Bain, of Kentucky. After speaking of the dry wave which is sweeping over the South, he said: "I believe that in future years the arm of God will stretch out and save the country from the liquor traffic."

When Rev. Anna H. Shaw gave her scholarly address the Armory was well filled, and the audience gave her the closest attention for more than an hour. "I have never worked for a defeated cause," she said. "We may be defeated in a battle now and then; but, for an army with their feet founded on the rock of right principles, the victory is as sure to-night as it is in the future generations. It is just as impossible to live in a republic with the saloon the dominating political power as it is in a country with half slaves and half freemen." Mrs. Martha M. Allen, National and World's Superintendent of medical temperance, who has just returned from London, where she was a delegate to the World's Congress on Alcoholism, gave an interesting address on "The Latest Word of Science on Alcohol."

The committee, with Mrs. Sarah R. Morris, of Richmond County, as chairman, presented a set of resolutions, which were accepted. They treated of "Scientific Temperance Instruction," "Franchise Prohibition," "Our Young People," "A Pure Press," "World's Temperance Sunday" and "Curfew." A new constitution and by-laws were adopted. The young people's societies, known as the Y's and Senior L. T. L., were combined under the name of "The Frances Willard League." Before the election of officers Mrs. Graham announced that circumstances would not permit of her considering a re-election. The corresponding secretary also gave expression to the same thought. The officers elected were as follows: President, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, Ph.D., Brooklyn; Vice-President, Mrs. Frances W. Graham, Lockport; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Nellie H. Hutchinson, Owego; Recording Secretary, Mrs. Mary B. Wood, Ithaca; General Secretary Frances Willard League, Mrs. Cora D. Graham, Syracuse; General Secretary of Junior L. T. L., Mrs. Florence B. Mitchell, Elmira.

Mrs. Boole, who formerly served the State as president for a period of years, thanked the delegates for the honor conferred, stating that she accepted the trust. Mrs. Cora D. Graham was appointed delegate at large from New York State to the national convention, to be held at Omaha, Neb., October 22 to 27, 1909. Invitations were received for 1910 convention from Troy, New York, Glens Falls and Olean. The invitation from Troy was accepted.

SAN FRANCISCO'S DOUBLE CELEBRATION

THIS week the people of San Francisco, and by sympathy the entire West, are at the close of a double celebration. From October 19 to October 24 has been a ceaseless round of festivities in commemoration of the rebuilding of the city after it had been practically destroyed by the great earthquake and fire of 1906, and also in memory of the discovery of the Bay of San Francisco by Don Gaspar de Portola, in 1769.

When in gala dress for the festival San Francisco was ablaze with two million electric lights by night. All of the splendid new buildings which have replaced the old were covered with flags, bunting and decorations.

Among the features of the celebration was an international armada of warships, including vessels from England, Japan, Italy, Holland, Germany and other countries, and a large contingent of American sea-fighters. Naval displays and military parades were planned on a magnificent scale. There was to be a great parade of school children, an automobile parade, an athletic tournament, concerts and other attractions. Don Gaspar de Portola, the Spanish discoverer, was to be impersonated, and to be presented to the Queen of the Festival.

Altogether, it was a memorable week. San Francisco has shown wonderful powers of recuperation, and the "New City of the Golden Gate" is a standing testimony of Western courage and enterprise. On the opposite page are presented several photographic views of the "new San Fran-Francisco." These give some idea of the imposing architecture and solidity of the splendid structures that are now found on every business street and thoroughfare.

The Bright Side

IT is an old and true saying that things are never as bad as we take them to be. Our own imagination and the babel and clamor of foolish voices around us delude us into believing conditions to be far worse than they really are. This is a universal experience. People in business talk gloomily of depression, when along comes an optimist, whose wide-open eyes can see the sunshine behind the passing cloud, and at a few bright words from his lips the whole landscape brightens.

Some poorly informed theological pessimists have lately been prating about the decline of the church and the decadence of the Christian religion. Well—let us open the eyes of our understanding and look at the facts. An increase of six and a quarter millions of Protestant church members is a pretty bright ray of sunshine, which the gloomy alarmists who are crying "decadence" hardly know how to hide from. Then there are great revivals going on, both in our own land and at the antipodes—gatherings such as the world has never known, for magnitude, deep fervor and rich spiritual results. Never in the memory of man have there been such vast assemblages of men and women, eager to know "the Way of Life," as Melbourne, Sydney, Adelaide, in Australia, and many of our own cities have witnessed this year. Take the great revival now going on in Chicago, where Gipsy Smith addresses audiences of 10,000 and upward, and where the converts are not individualized but counted en masse. How do our sad-faced pessimistic friends harmonize these wonderful scenes and events with their cheerless and despondent forecasts of a dying religion?

Away with gloom! Get into the sunshine! God's Word and the glorious Gospel of his blessed Son will stand sure and fast, while all the false philosophies pass away like the vanishing mists. Hear what that sound theologian, Professor Francis L. Patton, says:

"It is because we believe that Christianity came down from heaven, from God, God's blessed gift to man for man's salvation, that we are optimistic to the last degree. I believe that, sooner or later, if it were only through the simple doctrine of the soul's immortality and our inherent belief in it, that men will assert their birthright, claim their kinship with God; or from their hearts' depths will cry out for some way of being justified with him, and that they will rest not until they find it in the Gospel way."

A Saver of Lives

IT has become a habit with many thoughtless people to make fun of "the weather man," the local forecaster of the United States Weather Bureau, whenever his prophecy goes slightly astray, not stopping to think that where one forecast is not fulfilled those for the rest of the year may be absolutely correct. Once in a while winds and temperature play strange tricks, and seem to break the laws which close scientific investigation has taught us regulate their movements.

There is no guesswork about the forecasts of the Weather Bureau, and by none are they more respected than by those "who go down to the sea in ships," and whose lives depend often on the report of the nearest meteorological observer. The various stations are scattered all over the country, the reports of local weather conditions are telegraphed to the central office at Washington, and the temperatures and direction of storms placed on one great map, so that the forecasters can tell with reasonable accuracy where there are likely to be weather disturbances within the next twenty-four hours.

The stations on the southern coast of Florida were the means of saving hundreds of lives at the time of the recent hurricane. If it had not been for the warnings of the Weather Bureau there would have been a loss of life which would have appalled the whole country. The property loss, of course, has been enormous, but that in time can be made good. The observers saw that the barometer and other instruments indicated the approach of a hurricane; warnings were telegraphed and storm signals set; sea captains remained in harbor and others, who were near enough to see the signals, came in; perishable property was removed from the shore and people on the islands, as well as the workmen on the railway to Key West, were notified. Many of the people who lived in exposed situations came to Key West, and thus escaped the fate of a number who remained in their homes and were swept out to sea.

No more practical proof of the great value of the Weather Bureau is needed than its service in Florida.

A Question of Temperament

HERE is a delicate problem which a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD submits for consideration: Two young people, who know each other well, love one another truly, and fully appreciate each other's good qualities, desire to marry. But both are quick-tempered and impulsive, and, knowing this, they hesitate lest a union under such circumstances might be a mistake after all. The doubt naturally arises in their minds whether the little occasional ebullitions of temper to which both are subject would not be emphasized, rather than softened and sweetened, by the trials of wedded life. Would not the pair of fiery tempers kindle a flame of strife that would destroy all true happiness? In married life, should not one be the complement of the other, so that what is pronounced in the one may be modified by the other? Is there not more reasonable hope of happiness where a hot-tempered husband has a sweet, even-tempered wife than where both are quick and passionate?

We would like to hear from our readers on this interesting social and domestic problem. First, let the married ladies write us, then the husbands, who ought always to be pleased to gallantly allow their wives the first word, and, lastly, let us by all means hear from the young, unmarried folks, to whom the problem is, doubtless, of more importance than to any other class. Let them send their letters addressed "Temperament," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

No Shrieking Propaganda

WE are about to be favored with a visit from England's most militant suffragette, Mrs. Pankhurst, and her daughter, who is also widely known on the "other side" for her aggressive advocacy of the suffrage. These ladies, both prominent in their own land as leaders of what has become known there as the "violent sisterhood," will find that in this country the battle for the ballot is being conducted on quieter and more conservative lines. Mrs. Clarence H. Mackay, president and founder of the Equal Suffrage Society, has lately made plain the society's opposition to militant methods. "We propose," she says, "to promote the welfare of women by securing the national State and local electoral franchise, because we believe in the political and civil equality of men and women and that a system which disfranchises one-half the nation is unjust." This concrete statement, showing that the women's claim is one based on simple justice, is far better calculated to command a respectful hearing than the "shrieking propaganda of the streets," as illustrated by the militants. All the ablest suffragists are united in the conviction that dignity and decorum will do more to win the battle than methods which can only serve to disparage their cause and turn it to ridicule. Such methods, Mrs. Mackay pointedly adds, "have not been necessary here in the past, and they are not necessary now."

Oriental Ideas of Diplomacy

SOMEBODY seems to have blundered, both with regard to the appointment and the manner of the recall of the Hon. Charles R. Crane, of Illinois, as United States Minister to Peking. It is true, the appointee had no previous experience in diplomatic life; but he had spent several years in China, had become acquainted with many high officials, and, as a merchant in active business, was familiar with the "open door" problem and had studied the relations existing between China and other nations. Now that he has been suddenly recalled shortly after appointment as Minister, and before he could even reach his post, it is somewhat mystifying to have no specific or adequate reason assigned for such a course. It has been hinted, however, that the new Minister had given too free expression to his views on Eastern affairs to suit the intricate official etiquette of international diplomacy; but his instructions surely should have been such that an error of this kind would have been next to impossible. Tokyo might reasonably protest against a Minister who had fixed views concerning Manchuria and who trumpeted them in advance of his coming, and a similar objection might apply equally at Peking. All of which goes to prove that the Orientals value more than we do the ancient interpretation of diplomacy as the art of concealing one's real thoughts and opinions beneath a gloss of fine phrases and innocuous platitudes.

Should the "Maine" be Raised?

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: There is a strong sentiment in the United States in favor of raising the Maine, now lying on the bottom of Havana harbor. The dominant conceptions in the popular mind are: First, to recover the remains of any dead remaining in the wreck, and, second, to disclose whether the loss of the Maine was due to an explosion from inside or from outside the vessel.

About a month ago, at the annual encampment of the Union Veteran Legion, the delegates unanimously went on record as being in favor of raising the Maine. Newspaper articles that have recently been published make it appear that Admiral Sigsbee himself does not favor the raising of the Maine.

It is a matter of considerable importance to the millions interested to know definitely what stand the admiral takes in this matter. Do you know and will you tell? M. F.

We have always contended that the Maine should be raised, but we do not know Admiral Sigsbee's views. We have written to him on the subject, and have just received word from him that on the anniversary of the blowing up of the Maine (February 14) he will definitely put himself on record in the matter. He writes: "If you really want to know where I stand in regard to the raising of the Maine you must wait until I can exhume certain memoranda, not now readily accessible. I will define my position unequivocally in time for publication on the twelfth anniversary of the destruction of the Maine."

We at once replied, placing at the disposal of Admiral Sigsbee two pages in our issue of February 9 for this purpose, and beg the indulgence of our correspondent and our readers until then.

Our Monterey Relief Work

MEXICAN CONSULATE GENERAL,
32 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Editor of The Christian Herald:

DEAR SIR—I took the liberty to ask you this afternoon, through the telephone, if it was true that you had sent five thousand blankets to the destitute flood sufferers in Monterey, Mexico, and neighboring towns. Your reply was in the affirmative, adding that they had been already forwarded to their destination.

I have just received the two numbers of your paper of the 13th and 20th inst., referring to said remittance. I am deeply obliged to you for your courtesy in furnishing me with the information desired and in sending me the above papers. This charitable act on your part will be very much appreciated by my countrymen, and it will knit still closer the good relations fortunately existing between both nations. (Signed) C. ROMERO.

An Early Phase of the Comet — A Later Aspect, Showing Its Vast Length — Nebulous Matter Thrown Off by Nucleus — The Fan-like Tail, Millions of Miles Long

Four Varying Aspects of the Great Halley Comet, Which Will Soon Be Visible to the Naked Eye

A Celestial Wanderer's Approach

HALLEY'S comet, which has for centuries been visiting the earth about every seventy-six years, and which appeared last in 1835, after having traveled on a journey of 3,000,000,000 miles from us, is now coming into view at the rate of a million miles a day—a speed which would encircle the earth every half hour. Photography having become a substitute for the telescope in the minutest inspection of the heavens, two photographic plates were exposed at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, for about half an hour. They were directed toward the space in the sky where Mr. Crommelin's calculations showed the comet to be on that date. On the first inspection of the plates nothing out of the common was detected. Two days later, Professor Wolf of Heidelberg telegraphed the announcement of the discovery of the comet. A re-examination of the Greenwich plates enabled the observers to detect the faint impressions of the celestial visitor. A day later the Wolf discovery was confirmed by Professor Heber B. Curtis, with his Crossley reflector, at the Lick Observatory, Mount Hamilton, Calif. It was predicted that the wanderer would not be detected by the telescope until Christmas time. But the powerful forty-inch telescope at the Yerkes Observatory, Williams Bay, Wis., through the eye of Professor S. W. Burnham, on the mornings of September 16 and 17, greeted the first approach of the wanderer's return. The comet takes its name from Edmund Halley, the son of a London soap-boiler. As a boy at St. Paul's School he took a fancy for astronomical studies, and on proceeding to Queen's College, Oxford, in 1673, he devoted his energies to astronomy and mathematics and became one of the most distinguished scientific men of his age—the age of Newton, Wren, Hervelius, and others. At the age of sixty-four he became astronomer royal, and for a score of years, almost down to his death, he carried on unaided the work of Greenwich Observatory. Up to his time, comets were considered omens of ill, fore-runners of wars, pestilence, famine, and other frightful evils. Thompson refers to this popular belief when he says that as the rushing comet

Edmund Halley

> Sinks below the shading earth
> With awful train projected o'er the heavens,
> The guilty nations tremble.

Milton also describes how the comet "from his horrid hair shakes pestilence and war." This superstition was largely dissipated by the discovery by Edmund Halley of the periodic return of comets. The comet which, in 1682, occasioned the usual fear and terror afforded Halley an opportunity for close observation of the meteor's progress and history. At this time Newton was engaged on his great work of gravitation and the laws regulating the movements of the heavenly bodies—the principles embodied in his famous Principia. Halley twice made the journey to Cambridge to consult Newton about his investigations and discoveries, which he very soon gave boldly to the world. He hunted the records back and found that this comet of 1682 had the identical curve, speed and general elements of the comet of 1607, and that they were identical with the one of 1531; and he made up his mind that it was the same heavenly body, making visits to the earth about every seventy-six years, and he risked his reputation in predicting the appearance of the same comet in the year 1758, which he had calculated as its time of return. Feeling certain that he would not live until then, he said to the scientists of Europe when making his prediction: "And when it really appears, do not forget that it was an Englishman who made the first prediction of the return of any comet." Halley died sixteen years before the time scheduled for the reappearance of the comet, which was named after him. He was only twenty-six years of age when, by his discovery of the periodicity of comets, he made such a contribution to astronomical science. It will be the first of the year before ordinary telescopes will find the celestial wanderer and it will be Easter before people will be able to see it with the naked eye. By Whitsunday it will be a glorious sight, being then about 95,000,000 miles from the earth; then it will diminish in glory as it curves back on the return path around the sun, to disappear later in the year for another seventy-six years. The material universe is the expression of divine power and wisdom. The worlds move in their orbits according to the laws which their Maker has arranged for them, and his children, in their investigations, have discovered those laws. Men like Newton and Halley have found God's secrets in the size, speed and pathway of the stars, and have thus brought their fellow-men closer to the mind and heart of the Creator. Halley in his calculations about the comet only interpreted the knowledge which God reveals in the stars of night.

The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. (Ps. 19: 1, 2.)

The Fishing Spider

A spider the other day, in Florida, went fishing. It put its leg down into the water, and a minnow grabbed it. The spider jumped on the back of the fish, which dragged it under, and to the surface of the water several times; but the spider stung it to death, and after a long and diligent effort it got its game landed, and covered it with its web and feasted on its meat. Hunger is the basis of many of the arts and enterprises of life. The book of Proverbs describes the ingenuity and ability of the little creatures to provide for their necessities; makes mention of the ants providing their food, the conies making their houses, the locusts protecting themselves, and the spider nimble in spinning its web and supporting itself.

The spider taketh hold with her hands and is in kings' palaces. (Prov. 30: 28.)

The Sightless Flea

With its tremendous energy and its sharp-biting apparatus, it might be thought that the flea would have keen eyesight. This is a mistake, so we are told. After a series of experiments with the California flea, Professor C. W. Woodworth, of the University of California, announced recently that, although the insect has eyes, it does not see. He says it does not see material objects, but merely a variation of the rays of light when near an object. There is no formation of images on the retina of the eye of a flea, he says; all the insect sees when it approaches a solid object is a varying intensity of light rays. We can readily understand how fishes living in caves lose their eyesight, because nature will not go on making the organism of eyes when there is no light for them. But why a flea should have eyes and not see we cannot understand. The flea is not to blame, but people who have spiritual eyes and do not see are to blame. By wilful carelessness, neglect or disobedience, the eyes are closed to the light until, by and by, they seem to be unable to distinguish moral issues and spiritual duties. The Book, Christ, heaven are so covered with darkness to them as to be undistinguishable. What a pitiable thing it is to have this splendid spiritual endowment, and then refuse to use it in letting in the light and the images that would beautify the heart and save the life! The Psalmist, in referring to the idols, indicates that they have the organs of the five senses, but are unable to use them, and indicates that the heathen who made them and trusted them were also dull and dead in their spiritual faculties.

Eyes have they, but they see not. (Ps. 115: 5.)

Farms Versus Gunpowder

Mr. B. F. Yoakum, one of the leading railroad men of the country, in his address to the Oklahoma farmers the other day said these true things: "A forty-acre farm of irrigated land will comfortably support a family of five. It costs $55,000 to make a 12-inch gun. The money that goes to pay for this gun would reclaim 1,571 acres of land, providing homes for 196 people. When all the guns on all the battleships are shot one time, the government blows off in noise and smoke $150,000. This would reclaim more than 4,000 acres of land, giving homes to more than 500 farmers and their families. The money consumed in powder is lost to all the future. The farmer who buys the reclaimed land must pay the government back in ten years, so it does not cost the government anything."

The colossal expenditure of money for supposed future defense and offense will continue in this country, and to a larger extent in some other nations; but Mr. Yoakum's idea is the correct one, and the quicker we put our emphasis on the making rather than the destruction of values the better it will be for us. It is largely because, as a people, we have made so much of our farming interest that we have been blessed by divine Providence with our marvelous material thrift. Whatever warlike motions our or any other nation may be making, the spirit of the times is hastening to the period of farm-making rather than powder-burning; toward the glorious victories of peace rather than the bloody trophies of war.

They shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Mic. 4: 3.)

Energy Misdirected

While H. S. Myers was plowing a field on his farm, near York, Pa., the reins broke and the horse ran away. Tearing a hole in the rail fence, he ran into the village, and, with the plow hanging to him, dug up a considerable stretch of the town's smooth highway before his mad race was ended. A horse is a good thing, and so is a plow, in cultivating a field, but they are very bad things when tearing up the smooth streets of a village. So many failures in the material world are the result of misdirected energy, and for the same reason there are so many failures in the religious world. So many employ the very energies God gave them for the cultivation of a field in tearing up beautiful streets and making trouble generally. Discretion as well as conscience is needed to adjust the active powers to the practical duties of life.

My son, keep sound wisdom and discretion. (Prov. 3: 21.)

THE GREAT SOUTHERN STORM

ONE of the worst storms which have swept over the eastern part of the Gulf of Mexico in recent years began on Monday, October 11, and caused great damage and loss of life in southern Florida, in Cuba, and in the adjacent islands. The storm finally went off into the Atlantic and disappeared several hundred miles east of Jacksonville. The loss of property in the island of Key West alone is estimated conservatively at between two and three millions, and a large number of persons who made their homes on the low-lying islands, near the city, lost their lives. The interior of the State, fortunately, escaped the fury of the storm, though many of the people in the inland towns wondered whether the roofs would remain long above their heads.

The islands near Key West were swept by gigantic waves, and it was on these long, low sandbars that the greatest loss of life occurred. The islands at their highest elevation are not more than ten feet above the sea level, and the waves came surging in, green, white-crested and relentless, twenty feet high, from the Gulf. They went clear across the islands, carrying houses, fishing huts and the inhabitants into the sea. A great many of the outlying islands, which are dotted along the coast, have not been heard from at this writing, and their silence is regarded as ominous, and it is thought that probably all of the people who were on them and made a living by fishing and collecting sponges, have been drowned.

Key West, Florida, Visited by a Destructive Cyclonic Storm

A great deal of damage was caused to the shipping of south Florida. At least seventy vessels are known to have been wrecked, and there were a large number of coasting craft and small vessels beyond warning, which must have been swamped in the hurricane, as few of them could make a safe anchorage in such a storm. A number were driven on shore from their anchorage in Key West harbor and badly damaged. Most of those who were able to ride out the gale lost most of their masts and rigging. Two schooners from Boston were lost and a United States revenue cutter was driven upon the beach.

The storm made kindling wood of a large part of the city of Key West. It is a place of 20,000 inhabitants or more, and scarcely a house was left undamaged. Hundreds of buildings collapsed during the gale and were ruined beyond all hope of repair. So strong was the wind that brick buildings fell almost as rapidly as the lighter wooden structures; it seemed to literally tear whole streets of houses up by the foundation and throw them into a tangled heap of twisted beams, broken boarding and shattered bricks.

The city is built on a coral island, about two miles wide and seven long. It rises to eleven feet above sea level and is surrounded by a sea-wall of coral. The houses are not high, but this did not save them during this storm. There were several handsome churches and a cathedral, which show strong traces of Spanish influence. The entire island was noted for its valuable fruit trees and for the shrubs and flowers which grew about every house, and made the little plots fragrant and beautiful. The trees of the island—royal palms, banyans, cocoanuts, and numerous other varieties—were blown down and the flowers uprooted throughout the entire island. It will take years to restore the damage in this respect.

The United States Marine Hospital was among the larger buildings wrecked. Fortunately, the fifteen patients who were undergoing treatment were rescued. The quarters of the surgeon in charge, however, were utterly demolished. The hurricane struck the city at the rate of eighty miles an hour, at about four o'clock in the afternoon, and continued for six hours. The roof of the First National Bank was lifted off and sent hurtling into the neighboring buildings; two of the fire engine houses caved in, some of the horses were crushed to death, the men escaping with great difficulty. The large factories of the place, on which the prosperity of the city largely depends, were badly damaged.

Key West is a very important military post, and is often called "the key to the Gulf." The post suffered severely. Two of the barracks were unroofed, and their walls so shaken as to make them unsafe for further occupancy. In addition, every building on the military reservation was flooded. There are three companies of coast artillery stationed there, numbering about three hundred men. The wires in the city were all down, and the electric light plant damaged so the city was plunged in darkness early in the evening. The Mayor put the city under martial law at six o'clock, and called out the militia, the Key West Guards, to protect the ruined homes and prevent looting, which had already begun. Men from the neighboring islands, who have but scant respect for law—the blood of the buccanneers runs in the veins of many of them—and some people who came in from outlying points, began to pillage the ruins, and stern measures were at once adopted by the authorities. A large number of looters were caught in the act and at once locked up. One or two were shot by the sentries, it is reported.

It is a remarkable feature of the storm that it kept to a very well-defined track, and did not die away, doing less and less damage, but was violent up to the very edge of its path and was only a gentle gale beyond. Miami seemed to be its uppermost limit. Tampa, up the west coast, hardly knew that one of the worst storms in years was in progress to the south. There was a little rain during the night and a strong breeze, but that was all. The morning which followed was one of the most beautiful that ever delighted the eyes of a northern traveler in this land of palms and flowers. A great many people besieged the telegraph offices, anxious to get news of relatives and friends to the south. The whole of Florida's population was greatly concerned over the disaster at the south, on account of the long silence which followed and the knowledge that many ships were over-due.

In the island of Cuba, Havana Province and Pinar del Rio Province suffered severely. The storm spent the most of its fury on the city of Havana itself, quite a number of houses being blown down, and twelve bodies have been found in the ruins. The damage to the city and to shipping in the harbor is estimated at half a million dollars. Half of the lighters in the harbor were swamped by the heavy seas, and one vessel drifted into the wreck of the Maine, and was saved with difficulty from joining the battleship on the bottom of the harbor. If the sugar crop has survived, the island will be thankful.

A GLANCE IN THE MIRROR

By ESTELLA M. HARRIS

ONE hundred years it was since first the sturdy pioneers of Whitneyville had chosen that spot for their home, and building their comfortable log houses, set out to win from the fertile soil and teeming rivers an abundant livelihood.

A century of faith and hope and progress — always progress — had passed, until now the town had grown to almost citylike proportions, and only a few scattering landmarks were left to show where the early pioneers had builded their homes.

The old church on the hill-top was one of these, and had always marked the place of worship ever since the days when it was only a stout log house. Then it had been remodeled into a comfortable frame building, until the present date, when the whole structure had been torn down and then rebuilt upon the most modern plans. Now, the beautiful edifice, all completed and equipped, stood ready to be dedicated anew during "Old Home" week.

In the old-fashioned parlor of her mother's home, and speculating carelessly about the coming festivities, Margaret Ellis was rocking gently to and fro with her hands clasped behind her head and with the toe of one dainty slippered foot just touching the ground and furnishing the motive power.

Life is very sweet at eighteen, and Margaret's heart was usually as gay and free; but at present she was a little bit puzzled as to how she could furbish up her old gown for the coming festivities, and not have it give evidence of having done brave duty for the past two years.

There were a few dollars in the family treasury, Margaret knew, towards her new winter suit; but alas! she also knew that the sum was not great enough to purchase the finery for which she longed with all her girlish heart. She could not help wishing that a fairy godmother would appear to give her three wishes like the stories of old.

She was a girl of literary as well as musical tastes, and one piece of good fortune had just come to her which had raised her hopes anew. She had entered a story contest started by a large publishing house, and that morning the postman had left an envelope containing the news that her little contribution had been taken, and also a check for ten dollars.

Mrs. Ellis was as happy as her daughter over the good fortune, and, yes indeed, Margaret could have her new suit at once, and in time for the dedication. With the little sum already laid by Margaret now could count $19.

"Don't you think I might go downtown this afternoon and buy it? There is only a short two weeks, and it will have to be made," questioned Margaret.

Mrs. Ellis gave an unqualified assent, and the now thoroughly happy girl flew around helping her mother with the morning tasks. Calling from the dining-room, she said, "I have been dreaming about that dress for weeks; it's become my heart's desire."

Times had not always been so hard in the Ellis home, and Margaret could remember when new gowns could be had for the asking and the horn of plenty was always full and running over; but reverses had come and a financial panic had ruined her father's business. Then, a few months later, Mr. Ellis suddenly died, and the little family found itself in straitened circumstances.

The home was their own, having been presented to Mrs. Ellis by her father as a wedding gift, and was free from any incumbrance. It was a dear little nest and had been fitted up and furnished in their prosperous days until, for beauty and comfort, too, it left little to be desired. But, aside from this, after the heavy expenses of Mr. Ellis' sickness and death were paid there was left but a paltry five hundred dollars in the bank to her account; and with no income, the widow hardly knew which way to turn.

"The sweet-faced girl in the plain gown who drew all eyes to herself"

Mrs. Ellis found, however, that by renting two of her furnished rooms she could earn a substantial sum and manage to keep Margaret in school. Living expenses, together with taxes, insurance and repairs on her house, left a very little margin for clothes, and so for the past five years Mrs. Ellis had dressed her daughter and herself mainly from garments which she had remodeled from those of more prosperous days. With Margaret's growth and this year's needs requiring immediate attention, poor Mrs. Ellis now felt that she had at last reached the end of her resources; so it was with great relief that she found the way now opened for a much needed new suit for her daughter.

"We will both go down this afternoon, won't we, mother?" and Margaret danced about the tidy kitchen.

"I'm going to sing at the dedication. You know Mr. Baxter has asked me to take a solo part in their special music, and we are to begin rehearsing right away, so you will be sure to go, won't you, mother, dear?"

Mrs. Ellis' only reply was a half-suppressed sigh, for well she knew that her daughter had a marvelous talent in her voice, and she did so long for the means to enable her to develop this gift.

"You'll be sure to go, won't you, mother? I could not do one-half so well unless you were there," Margaret persisted, but Mrs. Ellis, apparently not hearing the question, just then stepped into the pantry and made no reply.

Suddenly glancing up, Margaret caught the reflection of her mother in the mirror over the sink, and to Margaret's intense bewilderment, Mrs. Ellis was acting very strangely.

Holding out the skirt of her dress with one hand she regarded it scornfully, after which she surveyed her worn boots with a like expression, and then pressing her apron to her eyes she sobbed for a moment convulsively, although without a sound.

Margaret stared at this strange spectacle in amazement and then, all at once, she understood.

Mother, her mother, crying! The full significance of the act struck her with chilling force. In a moment she seemed to have grown older and to have left her careless youth behind.

"Indeed, go to the dedication! How could she? When had mother been anywhere? Strange she had not thought of it before! But surely it was years since mother had been away from home, except for a necessary trip down-town, and mother used to sing in the choir, and had always taught in the Sunday School before Margaret's father had died.

Now, it suddenly dawned upon Margaret that her own mother had positively no clothes suitable to wear away from home, and that for a long time past everything had been handed over to the daughter, who had accepted it all as her right, and grumbled—yes, that was the very word — often grumbled for more.

"What a mean, selfish girl I have been! Poor mother!" she thought. And then Margaret Ellis did some rapid brain work, and by the time Mrs. Ellis had recovered herself sufficiently to emerge from the pantry with a face as serene as ever, Margaret had her plans all made.

Suddenly announcing the necessity of a trip to the postoffice, Margaret ran down-town, and upon her return found that dinner was ready.

Afterwards Mrs. Ellis and her daughter finished up the work and then made ready for their shopping tour. Margaret noticed with a new keenness of vision the condition of her mother's worn black skirt and shabby bonnet.

"Well, I declare!" suddenly exclaimed Margaret, as she was pinning on her hat. "Here comes old Mrs. Baker, with her work-bag, ready to spend the afternoon."

"Oh, then you will have to go shopping without me," said Mrs. Ellis, stifling a sigh, but too courteous to show her disappointment over the unexpected arrival.

"Well, never mind, mother dear, you are tired anyway." And as Mrs. Ellis was politely receiving her visitor, Margaret went down the street, softly chuckling to herself as she thought of her own surreptitious visit to the home of Mrs. Baker just a few hours before.

Margaret made her purchases and left them at the dressmaker's with full instructions as to the work desired, and then reached home just as her mother was setting the table for tea.

"Well, dear, where is the new gown? I can hardly wait to see it," said Mrs. Ellis eagerly.

"Now, mother dear, I got everything all right, and left the things at Mrs. Fairweather's. I want you to let me have my own way and surprise you. You must wait until everything is done, and then you will see the whole suit all at once." Margaret supplemented her appeal with a caress that was irresistible, so Mrs. Ellis was fain to be content, although she wondered at this strange, girlish freak of her daughter.

"Oh, how I do wish I could go to the dedication!" she said wistfully to herself. "It does seem hard to be confined to the house for lack of clothes, for I couldn't bring myself to shame my daughter by appearing at church in my old bonnet and skirt. But then," and she gave herself a mental shake as she thought:

"Now, Sarah Ellis, you had ought to be ashamed of yourself, with all your blessings, to be pining for fine clothes; and you needn't let Margaret know, not for the world, why you stay at

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

Several letters addressed to this department show that there is an impression abroad that the Hall of Fame is in Washington, confusing it with Statuary Hall in the Capitol, to which each State is entitled to send statues of two of its most prominent citizens. The Hall of Fame is at New York University, University Heights, New York City. It is an open colonnade, half surrounding the university library. It contains no statues, only the tablets of bronze, bearing the names of those who have been selected as worthy of a place in the Hall of Fame.

R. D., Warren, Mass. What is the origin of the name of the month November?

It comes from the Latin novem, nine, as the month was originally the ninth month of the year. When Numa put in January and February, in 713 B.C., it became the eleventh month, as now, but no change was made in the name.

M. H., Grand Rapids, Mich. Will you please explain John 14, last part of twelfth verse? Could Jesus have meant anything greater in the way of healing the body, as the Scientists believe?

The "greater works" to which Jesus referred were not more transcendent miracles than he did, but the great ingathering of souls after his ascension, which it was not his personal mission on earth to accomplish. His own works were designed largely to aid weak faith; but he would confer on his disciples, by the energizing power of the Holy Spirit, the larger harvest of converting thousands in a day. He had sowed, they would reap; his labors were confined to Israel, theirs would extend to the ends of the Gentile world.

E. M. F., Everett, Mass. B's grandfather marries A's grandmother. What is the relationship of A and B?

There is no relationship, either in blood or in law. The word "step" is never used further back than the parental relation.

H. M., Duluth, Minn. 1. Who was Halley, who gave his name to the comet which has just begun to reappear? 2. When can it be seen by the naked eye?

1. Halley was the son of a London soap boiler. He was born in 1656 and died in 1742. At St. Paul's School he became interested in astronomy, and pursued the subject further at Oxford. In a few years he was famous. He became astronomer royal and head of Greenwich Observatory. Comets, before his day, were considered miraculous portents of disaster. He discovered that they had regular paths and periods when they appeared. 2. The comet will not be visible to the eye until about Easter.

J. L. H., Binghamton, N. Y. How did Paul become a Roman citizen?

He was free-born, that is, he inherited the rights of Roman citizenship, which had probably been earned by some of his ancestors through services rendered to the Roman State (see Acts 22:28).

J. B. McC., Baltimore, Md. 1. Did Nicodemus go to Christ in the night because of his timidity, or as a member of the Sanhedrin, to question him? 2. Did Christ's cleansing of the temple have anything to do with Nicodemus' going to Christ? 3. Do commentators and scholars consider Acts 2:14-40 as Peter's sermon? I heard a licensed minister say that Peter's sermon is not recorded in the Bible.

1. Nicodemus was a ruler and man of influence, and, knowing the avowed scorn of the Jewish officials, feared to come by day, hence his nocturnal visit. All we know of Nicodemus proves him to have been exceedingly timid. Indeed, it was not until after Joseph of Arimathea had come to the front, after the crucifixion (see John 19:39), that Nicodemus openly showed himself a follower of Jesus. 2. Possibly, though not necessarily so. Nicodemus had no doubt observed Jesus' work, including his miracles, and listened to his teachings at Jerusalem in Passover time. 3. Acts 2:14-36 is clearly taken from Peter's address, and is no douht a part of the sermon—the essential part. Verse 40 indicates that there was much more of the discourse. One of the ablest commentators, Professor Bernhard Weiss, calls it "the Pentecostal sermon, which he (Peter) delivered in the name of the twelve . . . and which resulted in the establishment of the first Messiah congregation."

E. P., Washingtonville, N. Y. What do the letters on some ten-cent pieces, beneath the wreath, stand for? I have heard some kind of a prize is offered if the letters spell some word. Is this true, and, if so, what is the prize?

The letters stand for the mint at which the coins were made. There is no prize of any kind connected with the coinage of the country in any way.

G. T., Sawtelle, Calif. Please give me Mother Shipton's prophecy.

There are a number of prophecies said to have been made by Mother Shipton. It is stated that Ursula Sonthiel, born 1488, died 1561, married Toby Shipton, of Knaresborough, England, and after gaining a reputation as a prophetess died at Clifton. Twenty prophecies are given in a tract published in 1641. We are unable to answer the second question sent. The best known is one which foretold that "carriages without horses would go," and various other wonders would come to pass, and finally that "the world unto an end shall come, in eighteen hundred eighty-one." This prophecy is believed to be a clever forgery of much more recent date.

D. S. W., Englewood, N. J. 1. Why is it that the American fleet of battleships are painted a dull gray instead of a light yellow and white, as formerly? 2. Why do girls wear diamond rings on the third finger of the right hand?

1. The dull gray is technically known as the "battle color." In the days of the famous "white squadron," before the Spanish War, the ships were painted white for ordinary service, and changed to gray when war threatened. The dull gray makes the ship a harder mark to hit, and on a misty day is practically invisible except at close range. It was finally decided that the ships should be kept in battle condition at all times, and the white was discarded in favor of the more sombre color. 2. Wearing the ring on the third finger of the left hand signifies that the young lady is engaged. To wear it on the third finger of the right hand signifies, if anything, that the young lady is heart-whole and fancy free. It is probably done as the third finger is the one on which a ring may be worn without interfering with the use of the hand.

M. A. B., Montclair, N. J. I do not clearly understand your subscribers' agency proposition. Do we draw commission in addition to the monthly State prize, irrespective of the number of new subscriptions we gain?

The Grand Monthly State Prizes will be awarded monthly, to those of our subscribers who send in the greatest number of new subscriptions in their State, and the names of the fortunate ones will be published in these columns. If the highest number be but ten new subscriptions, our agent receives $15 in addition to his commission of $5. If the agent sends in one hundred new subscriptions, his prize will be $150 in addition to his commission of $50. We hope we have now made clear to you the exceptional opportunity for earning big money that we present to the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family.

B. E., Rockland, Me. How long is an "ell," and what does the word mean?

An "ell" varies in different countries. The English ell was 45 inches, the Flemish 27, and the Scotch 37. It was derived from a measure the length of an arm. The cloth ell of 45 inches was used in England until they began to measure by the yard.

S. T. H. M., Fairfield, N. C. Explain the difference between alto and contralto in music.

The alto ranges between the tenor and the treble. It is much like the contralto, and is often called the lowest female voice. The contralto voice usually has a compass of two octaves, beginning with F below middle C. It is between a tenor and a soprano.

Mrs. J. A. H., Garfield, Wash. I saw a statement in a religious paper that the women whose names are found in the Hall of Fame are Frances E. Willard, Maria Mitchell and Mary Lyon. Is this correct?

Yes, only these three have been honored so far by having their names inscribed on the memorial tablets.

L. M. H., Brookfield, Mass. Who was Fata Morgana, mentioned in books of poetry?

It is the name yet given to the wonderful mirage seen in the Straits of Messina, between Sicily and the mainland of Italy. The mirage is sometimes duplicated, one image being inverted. It is also the name given to the fairy who was the sister of Arthur and pupil of the wizard Merlin. She lived at the bottom of a lake and gave treasures to those whom she liked.

L. P., Freeport, N. Y. What is the meaning of the Hebrew name Ebenezer?

It means "stone of help." In I. Sam. 4:1 it signifies the place where the Philistines were defeated by the Israelites, and in I. Sam. 7:12 it designates the monument set up by Samuel to commemorate the victory of the Israelites over the Philistines.

Reader, Denver, Colo. If a man buys a piece of real estate and has the deed recorded, and thereafter the deed is lost or destroyed by fire, can the person sell the property and the person not be violating the law in any shape or form?

The loss of the deed does not prevent sale of property by the man to whom it was conveyed by the deed, even if the latter were not recorded. Having been recorded, the deed itself is of minor importance. A certified copy from the record will answer every purpose.

Subscriber, Guilford, Conn. How can I charge a piece of steel so it will hold its magnetism permanently, or where can I get it done?

Artificial magnets cannot hold their drawing power indefinitely. It is necessary to have them recharged at intervals. Any one with an electric battery can recharge the magnet for you.

Referring to a recent paragraph in THE MAIL-BAG, in reply to a question by "D. B." concerning the clause in the Lord's Prayer, "Lead us not into temptation," Mrs. E. R. C., Champaign, Ill., writes: "I once heard an Israelite repeat the Lord's Prayer in what he said was the form used by the Christian Jews in Jerusalem. That clause on his lips was 'Lead us through temptation.' This has ever since seemed to me to be a satisfactory rendering of a passage that has caused much discussion. Temptations test our faith. If we pass 'through' them we are stronger than before meeting them."

W. E. T., Rahway, N. J. 1. The Jews who finally accept Christ will probably stand in the same relationship as other believers. No one can make an authoritative statement about it. 2. Commentators differ greatly in their interpretation of Rev. 21:1, 2. The millennium is the transition state from the old to the new earth. (See Isa. 65:17.) Some have interpreted the "new earth" to mean our own redeemed and regenerated world, purified by fire; others (as Knappenberger) write of it as "an added planet," and further that "God may add greatly to the brilliancy and numbers of the planetary bodies so as to almost infinitely increase the beauty and splendor of the skies . . . not that the material will be new, but its transformation will be complete." This would not imply a new creation.

THE BOWERY MISSION'S NEW HOME

By Rev. J. G. HALLIMOND, D.D., Supt.

IN the quietest possible fashion, the work of the Bowery Mission was transferred from the temporary hall at No. 37 Bowery to the new and permanent building at No. 227 Bowery on Thursday evening, September 30. The first words in the first meeting in the new hall were spoken by Dr. Klopsch, who welcomed the large crowd of men to the new home of the Bowery Mission. He explained that, while the building was incomplete, it had not been deemed wise to keep the men out any longer. He further announced that the dedication services would be held on November 7, the thirtieth anniversary of the opening of the Mission, and would continue for a week and include Sunday, November 14.

"I expect," he said, "that the men of the Bowery will then have a glorious time and that we will hear eloquence and music and prayer, such as the Mission has been accustomed to. The best thing we can do now is to rise and sing 'Praise God, from Whom All Blessings Flow,' and then we will all join in 'My Country, 'Tis of Thee!'"

This the men did with a will, and with a volume of sound that made the new rafters ring. The meeting then proceeded, under the charge of Mother Bird, along the usual lines of Bowery Mission meetings—prayer, song, testimony and the reading of the Word. Notwithstanding the fact that no public announcement had been made of this meeting, a large crowd assembled at the doors long before the time of opening, and hundreds were turned away, unable to find even standing room.

A Gospel Meeting in the Beautiful Hall of the New Bowery Mission

The new premises are situated near Rivington Street. The famous old mile-stone, one of the few historic pre-revolution relics remaining in the streets, denoting the first mile distant from the general post-office, stands just opposite. The building fronting to the Bowery is of five stories, the three top stories being devoted to business purposes, the two lower being occupied by the auditorium, while underneath, in the basement, has been built a beautiful hall for the "early morning breakfasts."

The floors of this room and the walls of the auditorium above, the organ gallery, visitors' gallery, superintendent's office, and stairways are all absolutely fireproof, there being no exposed woodwork until the ceiling is reached, except the seats. Even the doors and window casements are covered with metal. In the rear, with an entrance from Rivington Street, is a four-story brick building, to be used for kitchens, dressing rooms, Brotherhood room, social room, offices for the Labor Bureau, the Medical Department, dormitory and store rooms. The front of the building, facing on the Bowery, has been designed to suggest an English inn front of the sixteenth century. It is built of a very large brick, with a rough face, and laid with a wide joint. Both brick and joint are perfectly unique, there being no counterpart in any other building in the city.

The building is entered through an archway, over which is a Gothic lantern. Beyond the arch is a vestibule, arranged to protect the building from cold and noise. The moment one enters the building, although outside you have one of the busiest streets in the world, with four surface car tracks, an overhead railroad and the most frequented truck avenue in the city, you are struck with the perfect quietude and repose that you find. Above the entrance archway there is a wide bay-window projection, equaling the entire width of the building, with three openings, which are finished under an elaborate Gothic heading, with wide projecting eaves and a red-tiled roof. The face of the bay is covered with heavy copper, finished in an antique weather green. In the openings of the bay there are four illuminated glass windows, depicting in the most artistic fashion the parable of "The Prodigal Son." The windows are the work of the famous stained-glass artist, Mr. Sellers, of New York.

Entering the auditorium and turning to the right is a stairway to the visitors' gallery and the superintendent's office, from which there is telephone communication to other parts of the building. The auditorium is 90 feet long by 21 feet wide and 26 feet high. Its walls are finished in a hard composition material, giving a Caen stone effect. They are arranged with panelings, which have an enrichment of Gothic mouldings over the tops. There are eight side panels on a raised face, on which are inscribed in beautiful church text, and in red, blue, green and gold, eight of the most precious Scripture promises that the Bible contains. The wainscoting has a hard, impervious face of warm, light-brown brick, also laid out in panels. Between the wainscoting and the Caen stone walls is a green-vein marble capping. The ceiling is composed of a series of wood trusses and timbering, producing the characteristic effect of a church roof. This woodwork is finished in a blue-green color, and the ceiling spaces between the timbering are painted a cream color, with a marginal-stenciled border of light golden brown. The floor of the auditorium and the platform is of reinforced concrete, and is paved with a bright-red English tile, with white joints. This tiling is of extreme hardness; in fact, the hardest that is known. The floor is graded, with a catch-basin at the lowest point, to facilitate a thorough cleansing by water flushing.

The platform is approached on stairs at either side, and has a wide marble border around the edges, while at each corner is a beautiful barrier in marble with ornamental mouldings and paneling. Above the platform is the organ loft, finished on the face and on the under side with the same Caen stone material as is on the walls. It is paneled and moulded with considerable elaboration. The front of the organ is covered with beautiful display pipes, arranged in two towers, with intermediate piping, and the entire face of the organ is gilded with pure gold and is further enriched in decorations of blue and green. The fine old organ, which for so many years stood in the Mission at No. 55 Bowery, has been completely modernized and rebuilt by Mr. Louis F. Mohr, of New York City, whose father placed it many years ago in the Marquand Chapel of Princeton University. It stands to-day as an up-to-date, two-manual and pedal, tracker-action organ, with the most modern system for supplying wind to the large bellows. The wind pressure has been increased, many new and modern stops have been added, including a new tremolo, which makes the instrument much better adapted for solo work.

At the front end of the auditorium, opposite the organ, is a visitors' gallery. This is also in reinforced concrete, and finished in the same material as the rest of the hall. The seats are of quartered white oak, of massive construction, with heavy ends, slightly curved so as to give a more agreeable effect, and stained in dark green with a mission-chair effect and dull finish.

Just within the entrance arch of the Mission is a stairway leading down to the breakfast room, finished in cement and the sides lined with tile. The breakfast room is immediately beneath the auditorium, and is somewhat larger, extending under the sidewalk. The passage for entrance to the breakfast room is down one side of the room, and is defined by an iron railing, finished in light green. This leads the men to the rear, where coffee and food is dispensed from a marble counter with a tiled base. The entire central part of the room is free and open. The floor is of concrete; the walls, to the height of six feet, are covered with large English tiles, and above the tiles by an exceedingly hard and heavy plaster and painted with white enamel paint. Down the middle of the floor is a gutter, covered with a heavy, movable iron grating, in sections, the floor being slightly graded to facilitate cleaning. At the two diagonal corners of the room are brass boxes, set in the walls, containing connections for water and vacuum cleaners, both of which are to be used in keeping the place perfectly clean. In the rear of the breakfast room are toilet and bathrooms.

Passing through folding swing-doors at the rear of the auditorium, from the platform and on a level with it, we come to a wide passageway, on the right of which are dressing-rooms. Both the passage and the rooms are spotlessly white, the walls and the floor done in the best white tiles. The kitchen occupies the whole of the street floor in the rear building. Here again the walls, floor and supporting pillars are in white tiles. The closets, tables, chairs, etc., are all white, giving an impression of immaculate cleanliness. The architect, Mr. Henry G. Emery, of the firm of M. L. & H. G. Emery, who have accomplished such great things at the Mont-Lawn Children's Home, is to be congratulated on having so satisfactorily fulfilled the commission placed in his hands of providing a building perfectly noise-proof, effectively ventilated, and just about as near perfection as regards cleanliness and wholesomeness as is possible for a building in the centre of the metropolis.

With the enlargement of the Mission additional contributions will be needed to carry on the work commensurate with the need and opportunity for service. Our readers have given their prayerful support to this great missionary enterprise for the last twenty years, and we feel confident that they will be glad to give more this year in order that the Mission may not have to curtail any of its activities.

The Bowery Mission is entirely supported by voluntary contributions. All money-orders, checks, &c., should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Treasurer, 92 Bible House, New York City.

A PAGE FOR AMERICAN MOTHERS

By Margaret E. Sangster

Books and Sermons

THERE used to be, on the part of many conscientious Christians, a decided prejudice against novel reading. For one thing, it was considered a foolish waste of time; for another, people said that novel reading aroused emotions of compassion and commiseration for the predicaments of imaginary personages, while no feeling of pity was left for the sufferings of actual life. Again, good men and women exclaimed that the novel was not true, that fiction was divorced from fact, and that therefore it should be left to the idle and frivolous and ignored by the busy and sensible. Gradually a change has come to pass in sentiment and opinion. To-day it is universally conceded that imaginative literature is the highest form of effort in the field of letters. The writer of good fiction has a wider audience than the writer of history and a larger opportunity than any other preacher in the world.

No one who takes pains to keep abreast of current fiction can fail to notice that the novelists use their privilege of speaking to a host of readers with far more freedom than ministers use in their pulpits. The character of John Barclay, in A Certain Rich Man, is depicted in colors so striking and with so unerring a pen that the most casual reader is forced to see that the love of money, and the acquisition of it as the dominant motive in life, act as a dry rot upon the soul of man. The cruelty and rapacity, the unscrupulous greed which are mercilessly shown up in the story of John's progress from boyhood to middle age, are first and last essentially homiletic. The truth is that novels, if worth anything, are pictures of real life. We have passed through a period when much of the fiction offered the general public has dealt with subjects unfit for the printed page. Fortunately, we have now arrived at a reaction. The novelist of to-day is returning to the manner of an older time, and just as we looked for moral earnestness in the works of Charles Dickens, William M. Thackeray and Thomas Hardy, we expect it with confidence in those of William De Morgan, Winston Churchill and William Allen White.

It would be apart from the truth to say that the only office of the novel is to preach. One of its legitimate offices is to amuse. A woman who is tired with household work, who has few neighbors and little chance for social enjoyment, is entitled to the relaxation she can find in an entertaining story.

Wherever it is possible, a little money should be spent on the purchase of good books. Libraries abound and they offer all of us excellent privileges, and yet a home is incomplete and poorly furnished in which books have no place. The carpets and chairs, the crockery and the bric-a-brac may be of the plainest, but let the housekeeper expend her margin or her small economies at the book-seller's counter. Do without superfluities and provide the children with books and periodicals. By no means confine the former to those serious authors whose lot it is to remain on the shelves in fine bindings, and who are seldom read.

John's Mother

When John and Martha were married there was no anticipation on the part of either that their home should be shared by any but themselves. Both were young, and the parents of both were in early middle life. Martha's mother and father had a beautiful home of their own and, while they would have greeted John with delight as a member of the family if he would have consented to let them keep Martha beneath their roof, they had no notion of ever becoming an integral part of John's household.

John's people were not well-to-do, and the sudden death of his father a twelve-month after his marriage threw upon him the obligation to contribute to the support of his mother. On talking the matter over with Martha, he decided that the interests of the future would be most happily conserved by the coming of his mother to reside in his home. John was devoted to her, and she to him. Martha dreaded the addition of any one to her little Eden, but it was not in her nature to refrain from welcoming one at once so lonely and so dear to her husband as his widowed mother.

One would imagine that when two women both love any man, as he is sure to be loved by his wife and his mother, there would be angelic pleasure in the home that shelters the three. Yet few situations are more trying. The mother has ways fixed by the habits of a lifetime. She misses the independence she has hitherto had. By look or word she criticises the wife, and the latter resents it.

WHAT SHALL THEY FIND?

What shall they find when they open the lid?
Here in the box some pleasures are hid.
Something for Dorothy, something for May,
Something to help them in work or in play.
Open the box, dears, and give us a peep;
Yours is the pleasure to have and to keep.

How shall Martha and John's mother live in peace and conquer their difficulties? Helpful correspondence is invited.

—P. C. There are forms of grace to be used at the table. Among them none is better than "Bless, O Lord, we beseech thee, this food to our use and us to thy service, for Christ's sake. Amen." Another is, "We thank thee, O Lord, for our daily bread, and ask thy blessing to abide with us through the day." Another form is, "For what we are about to receive may the Lord make us truly thankful." Do not omit grace at the table. It may be said by yourself, or by the youngest child.

Crises in Domestic Life

EVERY household in which the means are limited knows what a drain is made on the exchequer when sickness invades the family. Notwithstanding the fact that the country has grown rich and that there are among us a great many people who are possessed of large wealth, the rank and file are still poor, and so they must continue. By poverty in this connection we do not mean beggary or squalor, or any of the accompaniments of life where men and women are herded together in the thickly crowded tenements of great cities. The poor man who sits in an unfurnished room with a rusty stove, a bare table and a broken chair or two, is not the man of whom we are thinking just now. His calamities have gone over his head, and they may be due to ignorance, to unkind circumstances, possibly to drink. All over the land there are in towns and villages families who are well educated and refined, and who have been brought up in an atmosphere of piety. They belong to the church, their children attend school, they count their resources very closely, and the dominant desire of their lives is to pay as they go, keep out of debt and come out even at the end of the year. Very likely they are working hard and pulling together, husbands, wives and children, in order to buy a home.

No matter how hard they may try, it seems to them that they never have a margin. If a domestic crisis comes, caused by an accident to the bread-winner, laying him aside for a time; by the illness of the wife, by the need of a surgical operation, by a siege of typhoid fever in the home, by the sadness of death and the expense of a funeral, these good people find it hard to recover from the strain. All that they can do is to pick up the burden and start up the difficult road with what courage they can muster. If they love one another, and have faith in God, and a fair amount of common sense, they will come out finally on the other side of the crisis and will regain whatever they have lost.

As a rainy day may come to any one, it is well to make some preparation for it during the hours of sunshine and calm. To save when the income is so small that no saving seems possible is by no means easy. Yet in American homes there is apt to be more or less wastefulness. Economy in its root meaning stands for wise management, and the exercise of a proper amount of self-denial on both sides. Neither husband nor wife can properly practise it alone. There may be hard places to cross before the family arrive at a goal of ease and prosperity. It is worth while, little by little, to put something aside that shall make the hard places tolerable while we are walking over the green sward and enjoying the cool breezes of health and tranquillity. Economy now makes life more enjoyable afterward.

Open-Air Living

No one who looks back over twenty or thirty years can fail to be impressed with the change that has come over us in reference to fresh air. Physicians in these days advise delicate patients to sleep out of doors, and send those who are threatened with pulmonary disease to live in the woods. Our homes are so arranged that the air drives through them in a free current all night long, and if we are wise we do not exclude the air in the daytime. A stuffy atmosphere, loaded with odors of cooking and infected by the exhalations of those who spend their time indoors, is enough to poison child or man and convicts those who prefer it of sanitary ignorance.

"I WANTS TO BE SOMEBODY"*

THERE'S a school for colored children
Built in a Southern town,
And the good it has accomplished
For them becomes renown;
They help somebody.

Once a little, crippled, black girl
Stood at its open door;
Said she, "Is dis de place where
Dey eddicate de po'r
To be somebody?

"I've often heard of dis place,
And, oh, I've prayed to come,
I'se gwine ter do de hes' I can:
Please tell me, is dere room
Here for somebody?

"And ef de Lord will spare me life,
And ef you'll let me come,
I'll help de oder folks to be
Good Christians 'round me home,
And be somebodies."

MRS. IDA PENDER PIERSON.

OUR RIVER IN JAPAN

JUST below the hedge it's flowing,
Down from Buzin's Mountains coming,
Coming, going,
Widening, flowing,
Flowing to the Inland Sea.

There are pictures in our River—
Pictures full of wondrous beauty—
Of the trees that bend above it,
Of the cloudlets floating o'er it,
Of the western sun and sky,
Of the mountains dark and high:
And our hearts are thrilled and glowing
As we stand and see it flowing,
Coming, going,
In its wondrous beauty flowing,
Flowing to the Inland Sea.

Standing on the bridge above it,
Gazing out upon the sea,
And the peace and rest it brought us,
As it day by day kept flowing,
Down from Buzin's Mountains coming,
Flowing to the Inland Sea.

There are times when even a boy should be "dressed up"; but, for every-day wear, fine clothes are out of place.

An ideal summer costume for an active youngster is this: Outing shirt, overalls, undershirt, cap, stockings and a pair of stout shoes.

Thus garbed, it makes little difference how dirty he gets, for it is always possible, by a generous application of Ivory Soap and water, to restore his hands, face and body to a state of cleanliness.

There is nothing better than Ivory Soap for that purpose. It contains no "free" (uncombined) alkali; no harmful ingredient of any kind. It is pure soap and nothing else.

Economy in foods

Economy in foods is a matter that interests everyone because this economy is measured by the results more than by what you pay to get them.

If you would compare all foods and take into consideration the quantity you get for your money, the quality of each and the benefit to you from eating it, you'd probably be amazed to see Quaker Oats without a competitor for first place.

There isn't a family that can't afford Quaker Oats, and there isn't one so wealthy that it can afford to be without the benefits that come from a regular diet of Quaker Oats.

Recent scientific tests for health, strength and endurance prove all the claims evermore for this wonderful food.

Eat Quaker Oats at least once a day; twice will bring better results in vigor and strength.

A DESCENDANT OF PATRIOTS

MRS. MARCIA STANLEY died at the home of her son, Mr. George C. Root, 189 Chestnut Street, New Britain, Conn., where she has lived for several years, Thursday, August 19, at 11 o'clock P.M., after a long illness of over ten months. She was only able to speak a few words all through her illness, but was patient and had a smile for every one.

Mrs. Marcia Stanley

Mrs. Stanley was a real Daughter of the Revolution, as her father fought in that war. He came from France, and his name was Recor. If Mrs. Stanley had lived until September 12 she would have been ninety-seven years old. She was twice married, and both husbands are dead. Mr. Dennie Root was her first husband. He was killed in an accident, and then some years later she married Mr. Oswin Stanley, of New Britain.

She is survived by one son, George C. Root, who was wounded in the War of the Rebellion, and one daughter, Mrs. Angeline Pratt, of Simsbury; one step-son, Mr. George Stanley, of Meriden, Conn.; four grandchildren, George Ernest Root of New Britain, Conn., Clarence R. Root of West Hartford, Conn., Fred and Charles Goodrich, and four great-grandchildren.

Mr. Charles Recor, of Plainville, Conn., her brother, who died the Saturday before she did, was eighty-two years old, and was buried on Tuesday and she on Friday of the same week, which left her the last of her family.

Mrs. Stanley's mother was a Boothe, of New Britain, Conn. Mr. Recor had one daughter, Mrs. I. P. Ryder, of Plainville, Conn.; two grandsons, Arthur Ryder and Charles Ryder, of Plainville, and one great granddaughter. Mrs. Stanley had always been a very capable and active woman all her life, and tried to do everything for herself until her illness. She was the oldest member of the New Britain Baptist Church.

home, for she is young and never suspects the reason."

On the afternoon before the dedication Margaret brought home the new suit and took her bulky parcel up into the guest chamber, where she arranged gown, hat and gloves in tempting array upon the bed and carefully locked the door, and went down stairs.

"To-morrow morning," she said in answer to Mrs. Ellis' look of inquiry, "you will see all th new clothes; and won't you be surprised!" she added softly to herself.

That evening Margaret attended the final rehearsal, and if her voice was just a little bit sweeter than ever before it was because of the happy heart within.

Morning dawned fair and glorious, and Mrs. Ellis tried to stifle the longings of her heart, and to be happy with her daughter as they performed together the usual morning tasks.

When all the work was completed and the first bell had begun to ring out a glad invitation, Margaret said joyfully: "Now, come. We will go upstairs and your patience shall be at last rewarded." A pause and then she added, "I do so wish you were going this beautiful morning."

While she was talking, Margaret carefully unlocked the door of the guest chamber, and ushering her mother inside, quickly stepped out again and closed the door.

Mrs. Ellis stopped a moment, and then caught her breath in surprise.

Surely her eyes must deceive her, for the garments spread out before her were not meant for a young girl, for there was a beautiful dress of soft gray cloth, a pretty hat, dainty violets peeping from the folds.

For a second a wave of dismay over her daughter's sacrifice, mingled with a tender love for the girl who had done so beautiful an act. Margaret's incomprehensible behavior of the last two weeks was understood.

Just then came Margaret's blithe voice from the hall, calling: "Hurry up, we do not want to be late, you know."

In all the big congregation that morning no one was happier than the little woman in gray, who sat well up towards the front; unless, perhaps, it might have been the sweet-faced girl in the plain gown, who drew all eyes to herself as she sang so tenderly the words of that sweet old hymn:

The homeland, oh the homeland,
The land of the free-born;
There is no night in the homeland,
But aye the fadeless morn.

IN REMEMBRANCE

I TAKE Thy body, broken, Lord, for me,
Thy blood, the emblem of thy love so free,
My eyes grow dim that gaze on Calvary,
This in remembrance,
This in remembrance of Thee!

Earth's glories fade; thy cross I count my own,
Its scorn and shame become as wealth unknown;
I give to Thee the heart to sinning prone,
Henceforth to serve Thee,
Henceforth to serve Thee alone.

And now the blessed hope of seeing Thee
Fills night with joy and morn with melody.
Lord Jesus, may each moment faithful be Until Thou come,
Until thou come for me!

—MRS. T. H. CAMP.

"THE STRAWBERRY HANDKERCHIEF"

A DELIGHTFUL love story of old Colonial Days in New York. The opening chapter of this New and Fascinating Serial, by Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, author of Jan Vedder's Wife, The Bow of Orange Ribbon, etc., will appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 24. It is a charming romance of that most picturesque period of early American history. Jansen Van Vroom and his wife Katrina, with their sailor son and their pretty daughter, Virginia, and her rival suitors, Joris Artaveldt and Batavius De Vries, make a characteristic group, around which the main action of the story revolves.

Begins in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, November 24.

Among the Workers

—Rev. Charles C. Creegan, for twenty-one years district secretary and general agent of the American Board of Foreign Missions in New York, has accepted the post of president of Fargo College, North Dakota.

—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the Central Union Mission of Washington, D. C., arrived on Sunday, the 17th inst. During the quarter century of the mission's history an incalculable amount of good has been accomplished, not only on specific religious lines, but in relieving distress, caring for the unfortunate, encouraging the despondent and enabling the "down-and-out" to turn over a new leaf. Altogether, it was a joyous anniversary, and the mission and its managers are to be cordially congratulated.

—The bill asking Congress to give to the United States Life Saving Service a system of chaplaincies, like that of the Army and Navy, is in the hands of the Committee on Foreign and Interstate Commerce. Rev. R. Ashley Cake, the proponent of the bill, has traveled the whole length of New Jersey, Long Island, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina coasts, giving the Gospel to the life savers. He is now giving his special attention to the bill, which will come up again at the next session of Congress.

—An inmate of Blackwell's Island, N. Y., having read in The Christian Herald the story of the effort by a convict in Dannemora prison to obtain good reading matter for his fellow-prisoners, writes us: "We have the Gospel sunshine in this prison, too. Through the effort of Rev. C. P. Tinker, we have a library of 1,000 books, and every month he distributes 300 magazines. Every Saturday he comes to the prison and distributes Christian Heralds. We all like to see him. Every Sunday we have a regular service."

Borrowed Capital*

MANY of us have grieved sincerely over the case of the man with one talent. He evidently meant no harm. He was simply dull and stupid.

Not only that, but he was a "poor-spirited" man, easily cowed and frightened. He was afraid to do anything with his money. He thought that probably whatever he did would be wrong. In his dark little mind he decided that the safest course was to put his talent carefully away.

It seems hard that we should be punished just as severely for our dulness as for our sin. Our hearts may be overflowing with love to God and humanity, and yet through our mere lack of brightness, and no ethical fault, we may make a blunder which ruins our prospects for life.

Here the parallel ends, for if our souls are right no amount of intellectual stupidity can, thank heaven! spoil our eternal joy.

But our Lord well pictures the true earthly condition. If we do not use well our one talent we shall fail in life, and what we should have gained by investing it wisely goes to the shrewd man, who already has as much as is good for him.

The moral, as in so many of our recent lessons, is the great one of improving our minds and our opportunities. Read, study, educate yourself. Take care of your health. Keep all your powers at the top of their efficiency. Make the most of every talent you possess.

Herbert Spencer says that education is to prepare us for "complete living." Dr. Samuel V. Cole says that it sheds the glory of heaven upon our daily tasks, never making them seem "common and beneath us, but rather enabling us to fulfil them in the best manner and the noblest spirit." It shows us how to turn the five talents into ten and how to double the one talent.

It is said that a young man once asked the president of Oberlin College if he could not take a shorter course of study. "Oh, yes," said the president, "but it all depends upon what you mean to make of yourself. When God wants to make an oak, he takes a hundred years; but when he wants only a squash, he takes six months."

This was an extreme illustration, and chiefly meant to be witty, but it holds a deep thought. Educate yourself for the great things, not merely to pile dollar upon dollar, but to understand and minister to the world's bitter needs. Let your talent increase by multiplying the souls saved for the Master and by the spreading of his light.

"I could work," one says, "if I only knew what to do."

Thousands are blindly seeking, in this way, for a field of labor. They are bound by their business, by family cares, by the limitations of physical weakness, of small means, of a remote and lonely home. But there is always some special outside work for us all to do. Pray the Lord that you may find it.

"The more I think of it," said Ruskin, "the more I find this conclusion impressed upon me: that the greatest thing a human soul ever does is to see something and tell what it saw in a plain way. Hundreds of people can talk for one who can think; but thousands can think for one who can see."

The man who doubles his five talents is the one who sees, and, seeing, understands. Let us pray that we may see—and, seeing, rise and do our Master's bidding.

Life Lessons from Hebrews*

THIS wonderful epistle, differing strikingly from the other Pauline epistles in phraseology, arrangement and general style, has been attributed to many other writers—among them Luke, Barnabas, Apollos, Clement of Rome, or some Alexandrian Christian. Calvin inclined to the view that Clement wrote it.

Our modern commentators agree that Paul was undoubtedly its author. To most of us, in spite of marked peculiarities, the internal evidence alone would prove this fact. The superiority of Christianity to Judaism is, naturally, a chief feature of the epistle. We are shown that Christianity is the substance and reality of what Judaism merely foretold and typified. It is made clear that the latter was to be superseded by the former.

All of these points are almost equally emphasized in Paul's other epistles, as in II. Cor. 3; Gal. 3 and 4, and II. Col. The condescension and exaltation of Christ; his mediatorship; his sacrificial character; the personal acceptance of man by God upon the birth of faith in the soul, all these are dwelt upon in every epistle of Paul. So also is the figure of the sword, as applied to the Word of God; the feeding of young Christians with the milk, and of those further advanced with the strong meat of the Word; the Christian life as a race; and many other similarities mark this wonderful book as of Pauline origin.

One fact does not often occur to the reader of the Hebrews, yet it explains much. The great temple at Jerusalem was the object of almost idolatry on the part of every loyal Jew. The apostate Christian could be no longer admitted into its sacred precincts. He was shut out.

This was an exclusion which could hardly be borne by any Hebrew. Paul understood it well. Listen to the compensations which are promised to those thus bereft: Christ is given us for a possession, purging our sins, worshiped of angels, reigning forever, anointed with the oil of gladness, sending forth ministering spirits to weak and ailing humanity, calling men his brethren, and saving them from the power of the Evil One, tempted himself and thus able to succor them that are tempted.

These were surely sweet compensations for the loss of the temple privileges, great though that was.

And these compensations belong no less to us than to the Jews of old.

Notice how constantly Paul alludes to the Old Testament worthies. He knew that no examples or illustrations would more keenly appeal to his Jewish readers.

There is no book more encouraging, perhaps, than is this epistle to those "compassed about with infirmities"—as who among us is not? Christ is "touched" by our sorrows. He walked the same thorny path along which so many of us are led. Therefore we need not be crushed by the feeling of our unworthiness. Let us come boldly to the throne of grace. God will not forget any "work and labor of love" that we may have done, and he will "save to the uttermost."

No book contains more "familiar quotations," more precious words, than this epistle. Entertaining "angels unawares"; "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day and forever"; "here we have no continuing city"; "to do good and to communicate forget not"; "let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us," and scores of others, which should be engraven on the hearts and lives of all Christians.

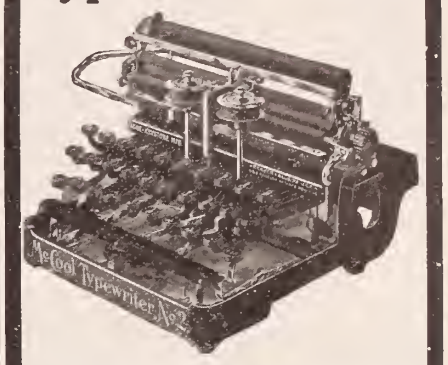
THE McCool Typewriter $25



A strictly first-class business typewriter for business use

Will do ALL you could ask of any typewriter. Side by side you cannot tell the difference between a letter written on the McCool and on a $100 machine. Will handle all correspondence required of any machine.

Sold direct from factory to you. Every middle profit cut out. Saves 45% in price. Only 319 PARTS against 2500 AND MORE in the high priced typewriters. This saves 30% in price.

We have over half a million dollars invested in our big manufacturing plant, covering five acres—one of the largest in the country.

The McCool is made in our factory. We buy material for 15,000 to 20,000 typewriters at a time. Every one of the 319 parts of the McCool is selected, put to supreme test for quality and accuracy. Every bearing and wearing surface is of hardened steel, finished to microscopical fineness, adjusted by micrometer.

The price recommends the McCOOL to business houses and merchants; particularly the smaller merchant, lawyer, clergyman, student, physician, teacher, where a typewriter has heretofore been thought prohibitive in price.

If you never saw a typewriter you can write on the McCOOL. Very simple. Nothing to learn but the keyboard.

The McCool Typewriter is unqualifiedly guaranteed in every way.

Shipped anywhere, carefully packed and boxed, delivered to any Express Company for $25.00. This is our factory price—absolutely the lowest ever made on a first-class typewriter. The Express charges vary with distances, but add very little to this our factory price.

You are perfectly safe. Remit $25. Test the McCOOL 10 days in the privacy of your office or home. If it fails in any way to meet your expectations, if you do not find it even BETTER than we have described—a handsome machine, greatly superior in every way—your money and express charges will be refunded promptly without argument. You have absolutely nothing to lose.

For $2.50 additional we will include a substantial Wood, Leatherette Covered Carrying Case with Brass Yale Lock and Key, Side Clasps, Genuine Leather Handles. A handsome, practical outfit, which with the Typewriter is about the size and weight of a hand grip.

You MUST READ our handsome illustrated Booklet fully describing the McCOOL Typewriter—the achievement of the century in typewriter construction. Free on request.

Preaching from a Ship's Pulpit*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"AND when it was day." It was November 1, A.D. 60, a little more than two months since Paul sailed from Cæsarea; the distance covered was nearly fourteen hundred miles. It was after the fourteen days on which they had been driven by the tempest in the Sea of Adria. On the night before they had heard strange and ominous sounds of breakers, and the sailors concluded they were nearing land, but what land they did not know. They made soundings with lead, and found they were approaching some shore, but fearing rocks they cast four anchors from the stern of the ship, and wished for the day. While the day was coming on Paul persuaded the people to eat food, as they had eaten little or nothing during the fourteen days in which they were tempest-tossed. Then and now, when people are troubled and anxious, it is impossible to swallow food, but Paul got them all into a cheerful mood, by giving thanks to God for the deliverance at hand, and then he brake bread and began to eat. Then they were all of good cheer, and took food.

In the dawning Paul had discovered a plot on the part of the sailors to get away from the ship; they had already lowered the lifeboat into the sea. Paul reported it to the centurion, and he ordered the ropes cut, so that the boat floated away. And when daylight had fully come, they saw a bay, and determined to beach the ship. To do this it was necessary to cut the ropes which held the anchors. They hoisted the foresail and the wind drove them into a place where two seas met. It was like a cauldron of surging waters, and the ship was broken in two.

"The soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners," because the lives of Roman officers were forfeit if they allowed the prisoners to escape. But Julius, the captain, had not the heart to kill the noble Paul, who had been such a stay to all on board. And so, for Paul's sake, he desisted, and commanded the prisoners to throw themselves overboard and swim for the shore, urging them to be the first to get to land. All on shipboard had to do the same, the less expert swimmers clinging to planks and other things from the ship.

"Then we knew that the island was called Melita." It is to-day called Malta. It can be seen on the map, a short distance south of the island of Sicily.

"The barbarians showed us no common kindness." Then it must have been uncommon kindness. Evidently the inhabitants of Malta were not cannibals, or even savages, but they were neither Jews, Greeks, nor Romans, hence called "barbarians."

It was cold and rainy on Melita, and the natives, in the kindness of their hearts, kindled a fire and provided comforts for the shipwrecked ones who had reached their shores.

"A viper came out by reason of the heat." It had unwittingly been gathered up with the sticks to make a fire. It came out of the fire and fastened itself upon Paul's hand. The natives were astonished, and concluded that Paul must be a murderer. But when they saw Paul shake the viper off into the fire, and no harm come to him, the natives changed their minds and thought he must be a god!

"Who also honored us with many honors." The chief man of the island was Publius, and he was very gracious, honoring and helping the shipwrecked ones.

"Paul, laying his hands on him, healed him." It was the father of Publius, who was sick of fever and dysentery, that Paul made well through the power of God. And not only did he heal the father of Publius, but all other diseased ones who were brought to him. When three months had passed the captain, Julius, with his band of prisoners, including Paul, sailed away for Rome on a ship called The Twin Brothers (probably "Castor and Pollux"); and the "barbarians," as friends, put on board such things as they needed.

Melita as It Is To-day

As the Jerusalem Sunday School pilgrims saw it in 1904. As we came in sight of the grand harbor, the whole island seemed to be a mass of solid buildings, constructed of slightly tinted orange stone, rising tier upon tier; this is the new city, but the old city is reached by a short railroad ride. It is there that the memory of Paul is honored by a magnificent cathedral, in which is a portrait of Paul and innumerable pictures depicting the life and shipwreck of Paul. The cathedral is said to be built where the house of Publius stood. There is also a church built out of the house where Paul is supposed to have lived as a Roman prisoner during the months he spent in Melita. A man was actively engaged clipping souvenirs from the inside of this building, assuring bystanders that in all the years since Paul was there the house had not changed! Seven miles below the old city is St. Paul's Bay. A fine marble monument is here erected to the apostle Paul. As we left Malta our captain graciously consented to sail as near St. Paul's Bay as it was safe to do, and we felt indeed we were sailing in historic, if not sacred, waters.

What the apostle Paul was on that voyage and sojourn at Melita the church should be to the whole world. When Paul saw that there was danger ahead in the season of tempests, he advised remaining in a safe harbor for a time. And so the church should utter its warnings to those who are in the path of destruction. The church should continually keep danger signals displayed.

Woe to him that getteth an evil gain to his house!
Woe to him that buildeth a town with blood, and establisheth a city by iniquity!
Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink!
Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink; that tarry late into the night till wine inflame them!
Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil!
Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight!
Woe unto them that justify the wicked for a bribe!

On our way to Australia we passed through Torres Straits, considered one of the most dangerous places in the world for navigation. We met a gentleman familiar with shipping, who gave us the following lines, which he called "a safety code," in use among the navigators in that region.

When on your starboard red appears,
It is your duty to keep clear;
When on your port green comes in view,
It is his duty to keep clear of you;
Green to green, red to red,
Perfect safety, go ahead.
When in danger and in doubt,
Always keep a sharp lookout.
And if there is no room to turn,
Ease her, stop her, go astern.

Is there anything in this code for the Christian mariner, sailing his own bark toward the port of heaven? Yes, first, keep out of the way of doing harm to others; second, keep away from those who may do harm to you; third, seek to co-operate with those you can help and by whom you can be helped; fourth, always be on the watch against evil; fifth, fall back when wrongdoing lures on.

But the advice of Paul was overruled, and the ship was taken out of the harbor into the sea, and for fourteen days was driven to and fro and almost engulfed. What did Paul then? "He maintained the supremacy of God," says Dr. Parker. Presumably Paul was the only Christian on that ship, and he recognized that man's extremity is God's opportunity. Wherever there is distress of any sort, from flood, or famine, or fire, or pestilence, let Christians by word and by deed proclaim God as the All Father. This is just the sort of thing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD plans to do with its thousands of readers as noble helpers. Paul said, "I believe God," and God had told him by the angel messenger that there should be no loss of life on the ship. And so can the church comfort the world, for "it is the mission of Christianity to destroy night and fear."

Paul was a check to evil doers on the ship. But for him the sailors would have put off in the darkness, and imperiled the lives of all on board by not being there to help in the raising of the sail and the beaching of the ship. How many men and women the church has taken, and saved from themselves and from doing harm to others, and made them useful members! And this is just the kind of work the church should go on doing.

And Paul stood by the ship until it went to pieces, for that was a part of God's plan revealed to him in the message sent by the angel, "there should be no loss of life, only of the ship." In the great earthquake which occurred in San Francisco only a few years ago many church buildings were destroyed, but church life was unharmed. Nearly if not quite all of the church edifices have been rebuilt. In God's sight man is more than the town, and more than the ship.

And Paul was among those who swam to the shore, and presently found himself among the barbarians. He accepted of their kindness and hospitality. The church should reach out to all classes and conditions of men. God is the Father of us all, and he is no respecter of persons. Christianity is the true internationalism.

When the viper attacked Paul he shook it off, and it did no harm. The church teaches us to cast off evil companions and evil habits.

The Arabs have a fable of a great magnetic rock, which would draw the nails out of all the vessels that sailed near it, and then the vessel would fall to pieces. So the world, with its allurements and temptations, would draw the iron of God's Word from our lives, and leave us castaways.

Paul cured the sick father of the governor of Melita, and he also healed all who were brought to him. The Lord Jesus himself was the first medical missionary. He declared that he was anointed to preach good tidings to the poor, to proclaim release to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, and to set at liberty them that are bruised. Those who have gone forth in his name have brought about some of the greatest triumphs in leading men to Christ through the agency of medical missions. The following story was told by a missionary from Africa in the Ecumenical Missionary Conference: "There came to our station an old man, who said: 'My daughter is sick; if I bring her here, will you cure her?' 'What is the matter?' I asked. He replied, 'She cannot walk.' 'How long has she been so?' 'Five or six months.' 'Where do you live?' 'Three days from here.' 'How will you get her here, if she cannot walk?' 'We will carry her.' 'Will you cure her?' 'We cannot say about that, but bring her here, and we will see.' She was brought, and remained for four months. When she went home she walked! She went back to her town, passing through a country that had always been a closed door to our missionaries. They had always kindly but positively refused to receive visits, but when the woman went along that journey of three days she carried a new message, a new hope. She said, 'We have not understood the people at God's station. They are for our good. See me! I was carried, now I walk.' And a few months after that, when my colleague and I went through that country, every door was open to us. In almost every place there had been those who had heard of the medical work, or had seen it, and at the end of the three days' journey the entire town seemed to come out to give us a royal welcome. And so the medical missionary stands on the advancing line to break down superstition, to open a way for the ministers of God, to bring these people nearer to the great hope of the world—the love of Christ."

After three month's sojourn at Melita, when Paul and the other prisoners were put on board ship going to Rome, they were loaded with gifts for their comfort by the "barbarians." If it was not Christian hospitality, it was something akin to it. We may think that they had been learning some lessons from Paul during all of the weeks he was among them. Silver and gold he had none, but he had spread upon them the garments of healing.

On our way to Australia, passing through Torres Straits, we came to Thursday Island. It was an interesting place to visit, with its groves of cocoanut palms, bordering on the bluest of seas, all dotted over with pearling fleets. Along the one street of the island were rows of small shops, with windows filled with pearls of priceless value. But something interested us more than these: it was the memorial cathedral. It looked like a huge barn, being built of heavy planks and plaster. Going inside, we found it seated in cathedral fashion, with a chancel and altar in the front. But on the walls were strange decorations, memorial tablets, life preservers, the steering-gear of a ship, a ship's lantern hanging from one of the rafters. Upon inquiry what it all meant, we were told that a few years before the Quetta, a ship from Glasgow, had been wrecked close to Thursday Island and all on board save two ladies and an infant had perished. Friends had erected this cathedral to their memory.

The Old Invalid's Blessing

READERS of this journal who have been personally interested in the case of the aged invalid widow of Nyack, N. Y., and through whose generosity a wheel-chair was provided for her, and many other comforts, during the past summer, will be pleased to read this letter from her daughter. The two have a hard struggle to live, and yet they show amid all their trials and difficulties a sweet confidence in Him who remembers the widow and the fatherless and who has sent them kind friends in their time of need. She writes:

"We would like to tell you how much we appreciate what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S kind readers have done for us. Mother was attacked last spring with serious trouble, which made her weaker than ever. As it followed her persistently the whole summer, it kept me in the house the greater part of the season. We felt that the dear Lord provided for us, as the money your readers so kindly donated kept us from actual want. Mother does not recover her lost strength and is not able to be left alone very long at a time. I praise the Lord that I am able to do as much as I do. It is in his strength, I am sure. We count on blessings, and keep on praising God. Mother sends her blessing to the dear CHRISTIAN HERALD people for their loving kindness in providing the chair for her."

A DOCTOR'S SLEEP

Found He Had to Leave Off Coffee

Many persons do not realize that a a bad stomach will cause insomnia.

Coffee drinking, being such an ancient and respectable form of dissipation, few realize that the drug—caffeine—contained in the coffee and tea, is one of the principal causes of dyspepsia and nervous troubles.

Without their usual portion of coffee or tea, the coffee topers are nervous, irritable and fretful. That's the way with a whiskey drinker. He has got to have his dram "to settle his nerves"—habit.

To leave off coffee is an easy matter if you want to try it, because Postum—well boiled according to directions—gives a gentle but natural support to the nerves and does not contain any drug—nothing but food.

Physicians know this to be true, as one from Ga. writes:

"I have cured myself of a long-standing case of Nervous Dyspepsia by leaving off coffee and using Postum, says the doctor.

"I also enjoy refreshing sleep, to which I had been an utter stranger for 20 years.

"In treating Dyspepsia in its various types, I find little trouble when I can induce patients to quit coffee and adopt Postum." The Dr. is right and "there's a reason." "Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

MYSTICISM

MYSTICISM; Its Psychology, History and Relation to Scripture, Church and Christian Life. By Rev. Junius B. Remensnyder, D.D., LL.D. Dr. Parkhurst speaks of this instructive monograph on "Mysticism" as "an arsenal of spiritual impulse." The mystical element in religion is too much overlooked by modern criticism, and this aversion to it on the part of some critics has made it easy for wild vagaries to get a foothold among Christian people. The treatise is lucid and scholarly, with a wealth of illustrations from writers ancient and modern. It is most timely in the present condition of religious thought. Mysticism has covered much extravagance and unreason, but without it prayer would become a formal ceremony. Though this subject is old, it is here presented by Dr. Remensnyder in a new aspect and in a most fair, discriminating and exhaustive manner, which takes a wonderful hold upon the reader's mind. We quote:

"The positive contribution of mysticism to religion has been of incalculable value. The harm of its excrescences has been far outweighed by its beneficent fruitage. Its great representatives have put in a more vivid setting the immanence of Deity. They have taught us that we should not live so far from God, but that we should ever walk in the light of his presence. They have shown us that nature is a divine parable, not only a symbol, but a sacramental medium of truth. And that, by entering into sympathy with her innermost moods, we can feel the pulse-beats of the eternal, and catch a glimpse of the garments of God. They have taught us to insist upon the legitimate sphere of faith, as that inward eye of the soul, which, opened by the Scriptures, can see far beyond the halting ken of reason into the sublime depths of the infinite."

Again, he says: "If the writings of Tauler, Boehme, Law, and other mystics, seem at times vague, and their experiences undefinable, this is the difficulty with all largest thoughts, deepest emotions and boldest imaginations. Language travails to give them adequate expression. Mists do not hover over narrow inlands, but hang above inaccessible peaks and shoreless oceans. From the mystics there have issued the noblest conceptions of Deity, and the most fervent calls to practical piety, to the higher life, and to the duties of purity, love, charity, humility and sacrifice. In a higher sense even than the poetical one, they have shown us 'the true Light, that lighteth every man that cometh into the world.'"

Dr. Remensnyder's brochure is published by the German Literary Board, Burlington, Ia. Price 25 cents.

Books Received

Lilavati Singh. A Sketch. By Florence L. Nichols. Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, Methodist Episcopal Church, 36 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass. 25 cents; postage, 4 cents. It is hard to dismiss this touching little book with a brief notice. It is very inspiring. Get it and read it.

Korea in Transition. By James S. Gale. New York, Young People's Missionary Movement of the United States and Canada. A fairly exhaustive and highly entertaining description of Korea, the Koreans and the wonderful change which our missionaries have effected there. Only the slip loosely inserted in the book tells the headquarters of this new publishing society. It should be on the first page of the book itself.

What They Did with Themselves. By Ernest Hamlin Abbott. Why Grow Old? By Orison Swett Marden, author of Every Man a King and Peace and Plenty. Until the Evening. By Arthur C. Benson. Homespun Religion. By Elmer Ellsworth Higley, D.D. The Master's Friendships. By J. R. Miller, author of The Silent Times, The Upper Currents, In Perfect Peace, etc. These five books are the newest issues in the "Worth While" series, of which T. Y. Crowell & Co., New York, have made such a great success. They are all well worth reading, are daintily bound, and are admirably suited for modest holiday gifts. They cost 35 cents each, by mail.

Oliver's Songs of Deliverance, with Personal Workers Guide-Book. Edited and compiled by Rev. F. Oliver. Containing many new hymns suited for aggressive Christian work, including solos, carols and Gospel songs. 256 pages, cloth cover. 30 cents per copy, $25 per 100. Published by the compiler, at 4330 Harrison Street, Kansas City, Mo.

The Gospel in Latin Lands. Outline Studies of Protestant Work in the Latin Countries of Europe and America. By Francis E. Clark, D.D., LL.D., and Harriet A. Clark. The Macmillan Company, New York. 50 cents. An admirably arranged and systematized account of the progress of evangelical Christianity in not only the European States into which the Roman empire was split up, but the American colonies of those States.

The Springs of Helicon. A study in the progress of English poetry, from Chaucer to Milton. By J. W. Mackail, M.A., LL.D., Sometime Fellow of Balliol College; Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. Longmans, Green & Co., New York. $1.25. This book is composed of lectures delivered at Oxford in 1906-08. They are sane and thoughtful, and teem with the philosophy of criticism as well as learning.

Alcohol. How It Affects the Individual, the Community and the Race. By Henry Smith Williams, M.D., LL.D. New York: The Century Company. The papers of which this little book is made up appeared as a series of articles in McClure's Magazine in 1908. They constitute an impregnable argument against the habitual use of alcohol, even in moderate quantities. Every library in America should contain this book, and all interested in conserving the health and morals of our nation should read and ponder its teachings.

Stories of the Great West. By Theodore Roosevelt. New York: The Century Company. The papers composing the first half of this volume are upon the following historical subjects: Daniel Boone; The Backwoodsmen of the Alleghanies; George Lewis Clark; Lewis and Clark, and "Remember the Alamo." The last half and largest consists of tales of Roosevelt's personal adventures in the West. They are all written with the zest and enthusiasm characteristic of their distinguished author. An admirable book for growing boys.

Mary of Magdala. By Harriette Gunn Roberson. The Saalfield Publishing Co., Chicago. $1.50. The author has created a story in which she has made Mary Magdalene the heroine, and a pure and beautiful maiden. Barabbas becomes a hero. Pontius Pilate carries to a greater extreme his unwillingness to crucify the Saviour, and Herodias' daughter is shown to be the unwilling tool of her wicked mother. The book is sadly lacking in literary quality, but tells its story dramatically and with much accuracy of historical detail.

Manuel in Mexico, Rafael in Italy, Kathleen in Ireland (three volumes in the "Little People Everywhere" series). By Etta Blaisdell McDonald and Julia Dalrymple. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 60 cents each. On a slender thread of plot and narrative are strung in these pretty little books descriptions of the life of a child in each of the countries mentioned. Its fauna and flora, its vales and cliffs, its cities and towns, are sketched, with touches of its politics and history. A new and entertaining variation of the idea of the Rollo books, so popular with the last generation.

Choosing a Vocation. By Frank Parsons, Ph.D., Director of the Vocation Bureau and Breadwinners' Institute, Boston. This is a decidedly interesting book, and gives a new treatment of an old and familiar subject, "What Occupation Shall We Choose For Our Boys and Girls?" Professor Parsons died before the volume was published. It is a book full of really practical suggestions for young men and women, and the mere reading of it will suffice to give a young person of either sex new ideas and a new estimate of his or her own character, capabilities and prospects. Professor Parsons' system, while analytical, is so simple that any one can comprehend it. As one of his young applicants remarked, "He goes through you with a lantern, but he does you good." Cloth covers, 165 pp. Price $1. Houghton, Mifflin Company, Boston and New York.

The Laws of Friendship. By Henry Churchill King, President of Oberlin College. The Macmillian Company, New York. $1.25. This book is made up of lectures delivered at Haverford College. Together they form a noble essay upon loving relations between man and man and between God and man. President King concludes with the heart of the whole matter: "Hear persistently the best in music. See persistently the best in art. Read persistently the best in literature. Stay persistently in the presence of the best in character. Results must follow such association with the best." "The laws of friendship are austere and eternal," he quotes from Emerson; and he closes with a beautiful thought from Phillips Brooks: "There is no more beautiful sight than the growth of two friends' natures as they grow old together." He likens it to "the Gospel method of the progressive saving of the soul by Christ."

A Book of Facts About 6% Irrigation Bonds

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds, based on 15 years of experience. It is a conservative statement of the vital facts of which we have intimate knowledge.

It will give you a clear conception of these ideal securities, which are now the most popular bonds that we handle.

Every investor, small or large, owes to himself a knowledge of these facts. Please send for the book—it is free.

An Unbiased Book

We are very large dealers in all good classes of bonds—Municipal, Corporation and Public Utility. We can offer you the choice of scores of such issues, and we just as gladly supply them as we do Irrigation bonds. So our position is not at all biased.

But Irrigation bonds have in late years become the most popular bonds that we handle. They are becoming more popular as they become better known. The reasons mean much to every investor, and they are all told in this book.

71 Issues Sold

In the past 15 years we have sold 71 separate issues of Reclamation bonds—Drainage and Irrigation—without a dollar of loss to any investor. We are now the largest dealers in this class of bonds, so our book is based on ample experience.

We buy and sell Entire Issues of Reclamation bonds. Our own engineers and attorneys pass on every detail. An officer of our Company spends most of his time in the irrigated country, watching every project through to completion.

Being the largest dealers in Irrigation bonds, we have our pick of the issues. There are few projects of this kind, save Government projects, which we are not invited to finance. We are able, therefore, to supply our customers with the best of these securities, all based on well-located lands.

Farm Lien Security

Irrigation bonds are secured by first liens on the most fertile farm lands in America. The liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. And the water immediately multiplies the land's value.

The liens are conservative. Usually they will not exceed one-fourth the land's value. The liens are paid off in ten annual installments.

The first crop from the land is frequently sufficient to pay the whole lien—often by several times over. These liens, therefore, have many advantages over the usual farm mortgage.

(5.)

In addition, the bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns, and which the proceeds of the bonds help to build and buy.

Some Irrigation bonds are municipal securities, issued by organized districts. Such bonds, like School bonds, form a tax lien on all the real property lying in populous districts.

Some Irrigation bonds are issued under all the provisions of the Federal law known as the "Carey Act."

In all the projects we finance the security is ample and ideal. One can scarcely conceive of anything better.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent. interest. This is a larger rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

This high rate is due to the fact that irrigation projects are profitable. The demand for irrigated land exceeds the supply. Many millions of dollars can be utilized at once in these projects, and this liberal rate is paid to obtain the funds.

$100—$500—$1,000

These are serial bonds, running from two to twelve years. So one may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

The bonds are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

Luther and Baptism

SUBSCRIBER, Addison, Pa. A member of the Church of the Brethren (Dunkard) says immersion, face forward three times, is the only right baptism. He also says Martin Luther baptized by immersion only.

I would like to know: (1) If Luther did immerse? (2) If he did immerse, did he not also sprinkle? (3) Was everybody baptized, in Luther's time, by immersion? (4) If immersion was the only way in Luther's time, why do the Lutherans and Reformers baptize by sprinkling nowadays?

We have submitted this letter to Rev. James B. Remensnyder, D.D., LL.D., pastor of St. James' Lutheran Church, New York City, who gives the following answer:

"EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: My attention has been called by one of your correspondents to the statement made by a member of the Dunkard, or Brethren Church, that Luther baptized by immersion only. The question is also raised, How it has come about that Lutherans now baptize by effusion, or sprinkling?

"It is not correct that Luther baptized by immersion only. The truth is as follows: Down to the thirteenth century the common practice of the church was by immersion. But it was not held that sprinkling was invalid, as witness the permission given in the Didacte, or Teaching of the Apostles, about 120 A.D., to practise effusion. As either method was held to be a valid baptism, pouring became more and more general.

"The Reformers found both methods in use, and some leaned to immersion and others to sprinkling. Luther, it is true, preferred immersion, as more striking in its symbolism, that was all. But he stood upon the common ground of the day, that either was a genuine baptism. And he especially repudiates the claim that immersion is necessary (Erlangen Edition of his works, Volume XXI, page 229). As to the attitude of our communion of to-day, when effusion has superseded immersion, as being more universally adopted, the Lutheran Church teaches that baptism by immersion is a valid baptism, but she lays no stress on the mode of applying the water, for the validity of the sacrament does not depend upon this.

"No Lutheran minister of the present day, however, would immerse any one, nor would any of his members, who understands the Biblical teaching concerning the nature and significance of baptism, ask that baptism be administered by immersion, because in the present state of the controversy this would imply that immersion was a more valid mode of baptism than pouring or sprinkling, an error which the Lutheran Church emphatically repudiates."

He Didn't "Locate"

A SOUTHERN writer tells the story of a Richmond man who had among his help an old negro who, through much saving, had been able to send his son to a negro college. When the youth returned to Richmond after completing his course he proceeded, much to his parent's surprise, to air his opinions on various subjects in a more or less diffuse and florid style. One day the old man took him aside and addressed him. "Richard Thompson Jenkins," said he, "I'se been listenin' to yo' fo' seberal days, an' it's my opinyun dat yo' talk an' talk an' talk. Yo' doan' reach into de stummick of yo' subjeck; but yo' jes argufy an' argufy. Yo' doan' locate, Richard Thompson Jenkins, yo' doan' locate!"

This is the way with a certain class of preachers. Ordained to preach the Gospel and save souls, they wander off into other fields, and discuss a wide range of topics having little or no relation to the main business in view. They fail "to locate."

Convalescence — Nature's Trying Work

After the siege of illness nature must do double work to build up the worn-out tissues. The process of repairing is often a slow and tedious one unless Nature is assisted in some way. That's when your physician will prescribe a tonic—ask him about

Sanatogen
THE FOOD-TONIC

Sanatogen contains just the proper elements to make recovery quick and sure. Without overworking the digestive organs, Sanatogen supplies a body and brain builder at one time. The greater part is albumen—the nutritive part of pure milk made absolutely pure, while the other is Sodium Glycero-Phosphate, the most important constituent of the brain and nerve centres. These two properties are so prepared and combined that they make Sanatogen the most valuable and reliable system builder known to medical science.

In The Public Service

The President of the United States works for 80,000,000 people all the time.

He needs rest and change to keep him fit for his work, and yet he cannot neglect his official duties, he must always be within reach.

When Washington was president he rode his horse as far as Mount Vernon and kept in touch by messenger with the affairs of state. The President to-day has a wider range and can seek the cooling breezes of the New England coast.

The long distance telephone keeps him in constant communication with the capital and the nation.

The railroad will carry him back to Washington in a day, but usually he need not make even this brief journey. The Bell telephone enables him to send his voice instead, not only to Washington but to any other point.

The Bell system performs this service not only for the President, but for the whole public.

This system has been built up so gradually and extended so quietly that busy men hardly realize its magnitude or appreciate its full value.

Forty thousand cities, towns and villages are connected by the Bell system, which serves all the people all the time.

The Bell telephone has become the implement of a nation. It increases the sum total of human efficiency, and makes every hour of the day more valuable to busy men and women.

The highest type of public service can be achieved only by one policy, one system, universal service.

The Famous "Business Man"

I KNEW a famous "business man,"
A merchant all his life;
Loved competition as his soul,
Enjoyed financial strife.

He also owned some farms, they say;
Things prospered in his hand,
His "interests" grew and multiplied
Like ocean's golden sand.

The first and last words of his "creed"
Were "honesty" and "truth";
He always clung to money as Naomi clung to Ruth.

He never had the time to laugh,
Smiles feared to near his lips,
For they were sure to be destroyed
Like storm-beridden ships.

He had a sort of mummy face,
'Twas hard and fierce and cold,
And life itself would seem extinct
Unless you mentioned gold.

Oh, then his ears would soon prick up!
How joy would fill his soul!
As he bethought how he could reach
Some monetary goal.

But just because he had not time
His food to masticate,
Disease soon came to stare at him
And soon declared his fate.

He could have been a happy man,
Enjoyed to some extent
The wealth which he so hardly gained
And which so hardly spent.

But greed had pulled him out of line,
His soul was full alloyed,
His mind was all one-sided and
His intellect destroyed.

I think I'll join that clan for which Wealth cannot qualify;
Their sign is love and charity,
Their gold is in the sky.

What this world needs, it seems to me,
Is not "financial kings,"
But men whose love and tenderness
Are ever doing things.

Now for myself I speak alone,
I'd rather "just be glad"
Than have the great Crœsus' wealth
And be so money-mad.

I think I'll spend a part of life
In seeking out the best;
The best of men, the truest hearts,
Trust Father with the rest.

PAUL'S SHIPWRECK

By Mrs. M. Baxter

IT must have been somewhat startling to the mariners on the ship with Paul to find that a simple passenger, a prisoner, should claim to know more about the course they were taking than the captain of the ship, and that this man should speak with such quiet, calm assurance about it. What amount of theology, what amount of logic, would have so convinced them of the reality of God and of his presence? It needed but that Paul, filled with the Holy Ghost, should be on board, that Paul and his God should be at one; and no single member of the crew could be unaffected. There is unconscious but certain power in the very presence of a man who is filled with the Spirit. Christ is in him, and he cannot be hid.

By and by, as the ship was "driven up and down in Adria, about midnight, the shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country." On this stormy, rocky coast, the situation was perilous. Were Paul's predictions about to be realized? There was one on the ship who was not busy wishing for the day. Paul was quietly resting in God, but he was not asleep. Under cover of the darkness, some of the sailors tried to flee out of the ship, in the hope of saving their lives. "Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers, Except these abide in the ship ye cannot be saved." Paul had put them into God's hands, and they must not take themselves out. "God helps those who help themselves" is a very common saying, but we do not find it in God's Word. On the contrary, we find that that which God seeks in us is faith. Faith rests in what God is, what God does, what God says. When we put a thing or a person into God's hands by faith, we believe God undertakes that thing or that person, and that we need not meddle with it or with him, except when clearly directed to do so.

God was in command of the ship; the man who of all on board had the least official right, from a human point of view, was used as his instrument. Influenced by him, "the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off." Here was a prisoner in command over the soldiers whose office was to guard him, and he and they completely frustrating the designs of the sailors, whose part it was to manage the ship; so strangely does God overturn human relations of men, the one to the other.

Paul, while the day was coming on, besought them to take food, saying, "This is the fourteenth day that we have tarried, and continued fasting, having taken nothing. Wherefore I pray you to take some meat; for this is for your health; for there shall not an hair fall from the head of any of you." The influence of one man so free in spirit, so confident and happy in God, reacted on them all. The current was turned. Thus two hundred and seventy-five persons were brought to see something of God. Courage rose, they were all ready to lend a hand to help, and so, after a good meal, they cast out the wheat into the sea.

Morning dawned, and with it they saw the shore, and discovered "a certain creek, into which they were minded to thrust in the ship." Before reaching the shore they came to a place where two seas met, and ran the ship aground. Until they touched shore, the Lord did not permit the ship to go to pieces. Then the fore part stuck fast, and "the hinder part was broken with the violence of the waves."

Still another danger threatened. The soldiers gave counsel that all the prisoners should be killed, lest they should escape. It seemed as though at the very last the word of the Lord would fail. But the centurion kept them from their purpose; "they escaped all safe to land." And every one of them knew that the hand of that God whom Paul worshiped had brought about their deliverance.

A Little Girl's Apppeal

FROM a little Italian girl, who was sent to Mont-Lawn with other children from the same tenement neighborhood in New York, the following letter was received:

"My Dear Dr. Klopsch: I am a little girl, and I am going to ask of you a great favor. My name is Corina Calabrese, the daughter of Father Calabrese, the Methodist minister, who has many years had charge of the Bleecker Street Mission. My papa is dead. My mamma got us another papa; his name is Prisotti. He is a musician, and mamma and papa both have to work. Papa and mamma are very good to me, and to all of his children; but we are poor. I'm trying, with Mr. Devare's help, to get a musical education. I would like a long rest in the country.

"Now, dear Dr. Klopsch, would you kindly give me an extra week at this lovely place, please? I know it will do me so much good, and I am praying the Lord to put it in your heart to say 'Yes!'

"I am asking Mr. Devare's typewriter to write this for me. He told me I could. Yours lovingly,

"(Signed) Corina Calabrese."

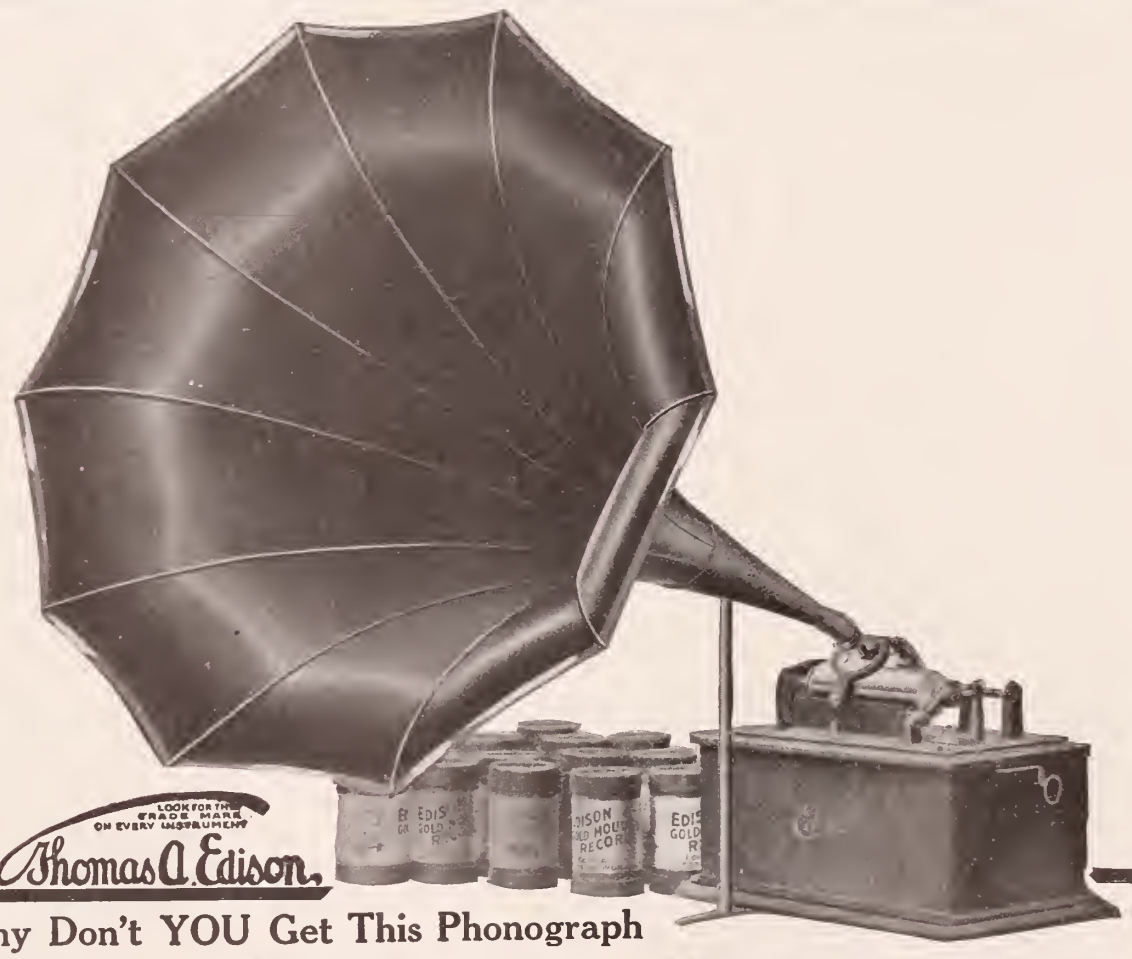
Little Corina's appeal was granted, and she stayed the extra week at our Children's Home. She is a dear child and gives promise of becoming a really fine musician.



Why Don't YOU Get This Phonograph

On FREE TRIAL?

FOR almost three years I have been making the most liberal phonograph offer ever known! I have given hosts of people the opportunity of hearing the genuine Edison Phonograph right in their own homes without charging them a single penny. So far you have missed all this. Why? Possibly you don't quite understand my offer yet. Listen!

MY OFFER:

I will send you this Genuine Edison Fireside Outfit (the newest model), complete with one dozen Edison Gold Moulded Records, for an absolutely free trial. I don't ask any money down or in advance. There are no C. O. D. shipments; no leases or mortgages on the outfit; no papers of any sort to sign. Absolutely nothing but a plain out-and-out offer to ship you this Phonograph together with a dozen records of your own selection on a free trial so that you can hear it and play it in your own home. I can't make this offer any plainer, any clearer, any better than it is. There is no catch about it anywhere. If you will stop and think just a moment, you will realize that the high standing of this concern would absolutely prohibit anything except a straightforward offer.

WHY I WANT to Lend You This Phonograph:

I know that there are thousands and thousands of people who have never heard the Genuine Edison Phonograph. I can't tell you one-twentieth of the wonders of the Edison, nothing I can say or write will make you actually hear the grand full beauty of its tones. No wonders can begin to describe the tender, delicate sweetness with which the Genuine Fireside Edison reproduces the soft, pleading notes of the flute, or the thunderous, crashing harmony of a full brass band selection. And you can get the records in any language you wish. The only way to make you actually realize these things for yourself is to loan you a Genuine Edison Phonograph free and let you try it.

Our Easy Payment Plan I have decided on an easy payment plan that gives you absolute use of the phonograph while paying for it. $2.00 a month pays for an outfit. There is absolutely no lease or mortgage of any kind, guarantee from a third party, no going before a notary public, and the payments are so very small and our terms so liberal that you never notice the payments.

If You Want to Keep It that is, if you wish to make the Phonograph your own, you may do so, but it is not compulsory. I am asking you merely to send for a free demonstration.

OWNERS OF EDISON'S — 1910 MODEL EQUIPMENTS NOW READY! All those who already own an Edison Phonograph can wonderfully improve their old machines, making them almost like the new 1910 machines, and can also get the SUPERB new 1910 Edison AMBEROL records, the loudest, clearest, most beautiful records ever made, playing TWICE AS LONG as any of the records heretofore made. OWNERS OF EDISONS—Write for free circular AA, describing all this.—F. K. BABSON, Manager.

You Don't Have to Buy It All I ask you to do is to invite as many as possible of your friends to hear this wonderful Fireside Edison. You will want to do this anyway because you will be giving them genuine pleasure. I feel absolutely certain that there will be at least one and probably more who will want an Edison of their own. If they don't, if not a single one of them orders a Phonograph (and this sometimes happens) I won't blame you in the slightest. I shall feel that you have done your part when you have given these free concerts. You won't be asked to act as our agent or even assist in the sale of a single instrument.

A Review of Religious Thought and Activity and Bible Expositor

Record of Christian Work

Founded 1881 by D.L.Moody. Edited by W.R.Moody. Subscription price $1 a Year. Canada 25c postage extra. Europe 50c postage extra

TWENTY-EIGHT years ago Mr. D. L. Moody founded the Record of Christian Work to meet what he observed to be a widefelt need in Bible Study. It was better, in his judgment, to read a few verses of Scripture daily with an understanding of their meaning, than to read chapters without appreciation of their spiritual value and force. To meet this need he conceived the idea of starting a periodical that would give a Daily Scripture Reading, with a lucid exposition upon the verses. Tens of thousands are now reading the Rev. J. H. Jowett, M.A.

BIBLE NOTES FOR DAILY DEVOTIONS

Conducted by REV. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D.D.

In many a home these daily readings have awakened new interest in personal study and the family altar, as well as forming a bond of union between absent ones and the family circle.

ONE THOUSAND PAGES of INSTRUCTIVE AND INSPIRATIONAL READING

Are afforded in the course of a year by the several departments covering every phase of life in church and home. Articles of Expository and Devotional character by the eminent leaders in the Bible Study; Reports of Missionary Labors at Home and Abroad; Thoughts for the Quiet Hour and other departments of practical value make the Record of Christian Work the periodical that is indispensable to Christian Worker as well as Bible Student.

AMONG THE CONTRIBUTORS ARE:

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN
REV. F. B. MEYER
REV. J. H. JOWETT
REV. J. STUART HOLDEN
MR. JOHN R. MOTT
MR. ROBERT E. SPEER
DR. ARTHUR T. PIERSON

And many others of world-wide repute.

Next to attending the Northfield Conferences, the Record of Christian Work is the best means of enjoying these gatherings. Verbatim Reports of the leading Addresses appear in the September and October issues, as well as in succeeding issues during the year.

To introduce the Record of Christian Work we are offering the following

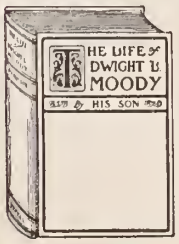
NEW AND ATTRACTIVE PREMIUMS

OFFER NO. 1.—Authorized Biography of D. L. Moody. By His Son. Regular Price $2.00.

This work is more than a record of the Evangelist's life, being also a history of the work at Northfield and Chicago which Mr. Moody established. In addition, it contains much interesting information relative to Chicago City Missionary Work, Illinois and National S.S. Work; the Christian Commission of the Civil War, and City, State and International Association Work, with all of which Christian enterprises Mr. Moody was at one time or another associated. This biography has received favorable comment from many reviews and contains the portraits of Mr. Moody taken at different periods of his life. Other illustrations present phases of the Evangelist's life not generally known.



Fully Illustrated. 590 Pages. Regular Price $2.00.

Record of Christian Work for 1 Year, and Authorized Biography of D. L. Moody — Postpaid for $1.50

OFFER No. 2.—British Weekly (Regular Price $2.75). Edited by Dr. Robertson Nicoll.

This periodical stands unique in the realm of religious journalism. Dr. Nicoll combines with a truly scholarly spirit a broad sympathy and charity and a sincere zeal for Evangelicalism. His editorials or "leaders" are alone worth the subscription price of the paper. This paper is probably more widely read by ministers than any periodical published. The book reviews, discussions of problems that are absorbing the attention of the deeply spiritual and thoughtful leaders in Christian work, descriptive articles of varied forms of philanthropic labor and biographical sketches of peculiar interest and fascination make the British Weekly a truly International Weekly.

Record of Christian Work and British Weekly for One Year. — Postpaid for $2.50

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

M. S., Ridgewood, N. J. Why do we speak of Mr. Reid as American Ambassador to the Court of St. James, instead of Ambassador to England?

St. James Palace, built in 1530-36, in the reign of Henry VIII., has been the official London residence of the sovereign since the fire at Whitehall Palace, in 1698, consequently Mr. Reid is spoken of officially as Ambassador to the Court of St. James. He is not merely Ambassador to England, as that is only one country of the several ruled by Edward VII., who is called King of Great Britain and Ireland, and dominions beyond the seas.

L. A., Lexington, Ky. 1. Did Paul write II. Corinthians before the Gospels were written? 2. What was "Gideon's Band"?

1. The time of writing II. Corinthians is supposed to have been about A.D. 57. It was evidently written in Macedonia. Matthew is the oldest of the Gospels, and commentators hold that it was probably written before the destruction of Jerusalem—some time between A.D. 37 and 60. Mark was probably written between 50 and 60 A.D., Luke about the same date, and John between 90 and 94 A.D. These dates are given by Jameson, Faussett and Brown. 2. The band were the three hundred chosen by Gideon from his army of 32,000 (see Judges, seventh chapter).

Mollie B., Los Angeles, Calif. Where can I find the "Golden Verses" of Pythagoras?

These are the verses:

"Let not soft slumber close thine eyes
Before thou recollectest thrice
Thy train of actions through the day:
Where have my feet found out their way?
What have I learned, where'er I've been,
From all I've heard, from all I've seen?
What have I done that's worth the doing?
What know I more that's worth the knowing?
What have I sought that I should shun?
What duty have I left undone?
Or into what new follies run?
These self-reflections are the road
That leads to Virtue and to God."

J. H. R., Sandusky, O. 1. By what means is Girard College, in Philadelphia, kept up? 2. Are men educated there for the ministry? 3. Was Mary Magdalene identical with Mary, the sister of Lazarus?

1. Stephen Girard provided an endowment of $2,000,000 for the college. 2. No, it is a secular college altogether; no religious instruction is permitted. 3. The evangelists give no clue to the identity of Mary Magdalene. Some commentators suggest that she was so named as coming from the town of Magdala. Some others, including Lightfoot and Baronius, hold that she was the same person as Mary, the sister of Lazarus, but this is considered improbable.

T. E. B., Morristown, Tenn. I have read that about fifty years ago some manuscripts were found in a monastery on Mount Sinai, which are older by about two hundred years than any others of the New Testament known to exist. Is it true?

The manuscript to which you refer is known as the Codex Sinaiticus, and is one of the oldest extant. It was found in the ancient monastery on Sinai by Professor Tischendorf, in 1859. It is second in value only to the Vatican manuscript, and has heen of great service in the work of Bible revision.

J. R., Nyack, N. Y. How does local option affect the general welfare and business of towns and villages where it is now in operation?

Favorably, in every case we know of. Take a few examples of this year, showing how local option works in towns and villages like your own. Here is the town of Stafford, Conn., which voted "no license" a year ago. After eight months' experience this was the result: Arrests for drunkenness, 8 cases, against 45 the same time the year before; arrests for assault, 6 cases, against 9; or a total of 14 arrests under "no license" as against 54 arrests for the same period under license. Stafford also reported 5 prisoners in jail under no license, as against 38 in jail in same period under license. In your own State, the town of Little Valley, Cattaraugus County (1,200 population), went no license four years ago. The village president reports trade excellent, no disorder, plenty of work, and not one appeal for charity. The merchants and business men report trade better than ever, bills promptly paid; farmers prosperous, factory payrolls larger; town cleaner and healthier, employees getting more pay per man, etc.

I. G., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. 1. What is the area of the State of Iowa? 2. How many counties has it?

1. Iowa has an area of 56,025 square miles.
2. There are 99 counties.

G. H. R., Shiremanstown, Pa. 1. What have been the religious affiliations of our Presidents? 2. What are those of the present cabinet?

1. Washington, Madison, Monroe, W. H. Harrison, Tyler, Taylor, Pierce and Arthur were Episcopalians. Jackson, Polk, Buchanan, Lincoln, Cleveland and Harrison were Presbyterians. Johnson, Grant, Hayes and McKinley were Methodists. John and J. Q. Adams were Congregationalists. Van Buren and Roosevelt belonged to the Dutch Reformed Church, Garfield to the sect of the Disciples. Jefferson was a Liberalist. Fillmore was a Unitarian, and so is Taft. 2. Knox is a Methodist, but attends an Episcopal Church in Washington, his wife being an Episcopalian. Wickersham, Von Meyer, MacVeagh and Nagel are Episcopalians. Dickinson and Wilson are Presbyterians. Ballinger and Hitchcock are Congregationalists.

W. D. M., Lawrenceburg, Ky., and C. N. M., Plainfield, Ia. Who founded the Baptist denomination, and when was it founded?

The Baptists claim that the apostolic church was essentially Baptist, and the same claim of being considered as believers in baptism, can reasonably be made by all the Christian churches. Orchard wrote that all Christian communities of the first three centuries were Baptist in constitution and practice. But the appellation of "Baptist" did not then belong to any of the churches specifically. The leading Baptist quarterly of America, The Christian Review (January, 1855, page 23), said: "We know of no assumption more destitute of historic support than that which claims to be able to trace the distinct and unbroken existence of the church essentially Baptist from the time of the apostles down to our own." Cutting, the historian (in his Vindication) takes the same view. Other historians broadly maintain that no organized body, known as Baptists and holding Baptist principles, can be found before 1520. The first known Baptist denomination is said to have been organized in Germany and Holland, about 1536. The first name given to the early church was simply "Christian," and this name, first used at Antioch, afterward became the general appellation of the churches wherever such were established in apostolic times.

Wm. C. A., West Sharon, Conn. 1. How many miles of railroad are there in the United States? 2. How many more miles than there were one hundred years ago?

1. In 1908 there were 225,227.23 miles of railroad operated. The mileage of the railroads was 224,382.19; second tracks and sidings, 99,651.19. 2. There were no railroads one hundred years ago. The first regular line of railroad in the United States was the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the first rail of which was laid in 1828. In 1830 there were 23 miles in operation.

One of our readers—a housekeeping matron—sends us these verses from a foreign publication, with a note of appreciation. "They deal with the domestic help problem," she writes, "and I must say I consider it a greater problem at the present time than woman suffrage." The author is writing of the average servant:

"She's a trial—a mortification—
A thorn in the flesh, one must own;
She causes us keen irritation,
And many a heart-rending groan;

"Her insolence, too, is surprising,
But rather I'd clothe her in silk
Than go to the trouble of rising
At seven to take in the milk!

"She's haughty, and cheeky, and vicious,
But still 'tis but decent to state:
The servant with manners pernicious
Does all the rough work that we hate."

Mrs. E. C. D., Lampasas, Tex. Paul on several occasions writes of his bonds, but his meaning is not always the same. In Acts 26:29 he speaks of actual bonds or manacles, which he wore as a prisoner at the time of his speaking. In Eph. 6:20, and Col. 4:18 he refers to the bonds he wore in prison, which chained him to the soldier who was his keeper. In some passages, he speaks of his spiritual bonds, i. e., his duty of service to Christ. The Epistle to the Colossians was probably written from his Roman prison (see Acts 28:16-30). According to some authorities, he was liberated and visited Greece, Asia Minor and Spain, but the majority hold that he was never released, but was put to death in Rome.

Subscriber, Athens, Ga. Some here say Robert Raikes was the first to organize a Sunday School; others say he only taught reading, spelling and arithmetic. Some say William Fox was the first to teach the Bible, he was the first Sunday School teacher; some say the first Sunday School in America was in Savannah, Ga.; others, New York, Philadelphia, and Charleston, S. C. Which is right?

History accords to Robert Raikes the honor of establishing the first Sunday School, in Gloucester, England, about 1784. For over thirty years prior to Raikes' experiment, however, Rev. John Wesley had been in the habit of assembling children in England for religious instruction. When he heard of Mr. Raikes' work, he gave it his cordial approval. Sunday Schools were introduced in the United States under Bishop Asbury, about 1780-85. The first Sunday School in Charleston, S. C., was started by Rev. George Daughaday, date uncertain. We have nothing authentic as to Savannah.

School Children Go on a Strike

SCHOOL children went on strike at Norristown, Pa., because the School Board ordered Bible reading to cease. The directors decided that the Bible should be banished from the schools, and prayers should be discontinued at the sessions. The boys and girls rose in rebellion, declared a strike, and, backed in most instances by their parents, refused to attend school until the order was rescinded and the Bible restored. They paraded the town, carrying Bibles and banners, cheered for the lone member of the Board who opposed the Bible-banishing order, waited on the County Superintendent and declared their intention of carrying the matter to the State House at Harrisburg, unless the prayers and Bible readings were continued. The schools were deserted and lawyers were at work, prompted by the parents of the children, looking up the law that permits or prohibits the action of the Board in ruling the Bible from the educational establishments.

J. R. M. M., Golspie. 1. Sound on essentials. 2. "Sheol" means the place of departed spirits, the state of the dead, the grave, the under-world.

H. W. E., Elwood, Neb., sends us a striking account of his escape from the fangs of a rattlesnake, which he regards as miraculous. He should be grateful for such a deliverance.

L. M. M., Wheeling, W. Va. 1. There is no record of John's baptism. 2. Interdenominational now, but originally Methodist, we believe.

D. F. A., Oxford, Kan. 1. Gum chewing in church or Sunday School is inexcusable. It is ill-mannered and irreverent. 2. Write to any good bookseller.

G. W. R., Monroe, Wash. The published biographies of John Knox, as far as we know, make no mention of such an incident and it sounds altogether improbable.

If "A Subscriber," of Tecumseh, who wished some information on the subject of engineering as a profession, will send full name and address he will receive an answer by mail.

M. E. C., Brooklyn, N. Y. The recent so-called "miraculous healings" are believed by medical men to be, to a large extent, the result of auto-hypnotism.

M., Upland, Ind. If conscience reproaches you, you should change your position at the earliest opportunity. There are some things in life for the loss of which nothing can repay us.

Reader, Lynchburg, Va. Yours is a sad case indeed, and you have our sympathy. There are many things we cannot understand in this life, but we can surely trust Him to make all clear hereafter.

Mrs. J. B. I., Brookton, N. Y. We cannot set bounds to God's love and mercy. He judges us as much by our opportunities as by the actual work accomplished. Besides, we are not to judge of others; that is God's exclusive prerogative.

Reader, McMinnville, Tenn. It is not the duty of a pastor to interfere in family disputes, otherwise than as a peacemaker, if at all, certainly never as a trouble-breeder. There may have been some misunderstanding in the case in question, which led him to speak as he did.

J. S., Wapakoneta, O. It is not wrong to give on the Sabbath that which is intended for the Lord's work, i. e., for the extension of the Gospel, or for works of charity or necessity. Business meetings should be held on week days.

Mrs. A. H. G., Sheldon, Mo., sends some appreciative verses to THE MAIL-BAG, one of which is as follows:

"God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD!
May its praises ever ring,
Firm and true and loyal,
To herald the coming King."

Reader, Springville, N. Y. Many lives have been wrecked by spiritualism. The lady you mention is probably a nervous, hysterical person, easily imposed upon. The Bible has many warnings against necromancy and "familiar" spirits, which reveal the fact that the same evils existed in those days that we see now. The Society of Psychical Research has put itself on record, after long investigation, as declaring that there is no authenticated record of genuine spirit communication, and that the so-called mediums are impostors.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR THE HOME

THE VISITORS TO THE GREAT EXPOSITION CAME FROM EVERY STATE IN THE UNION AND LIKED TO GATHER IN NOME CIRCLE TO REST

THE PASSING OF SEATTLE FAIR

ONE of the most successful expositions in the history of such enterprises was the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, which closed at Seattle on Saturday, October 16. It opened on June 1, with an enthusiastic crowd of 90,000 people in attendance, who had come from the four corners of the earth to view the resources of Alaska and the Pacific States. Visitors who had seen half a dozen of the world's fairs were much impressed by the compactness and great natural beauty of the one at Seattle. St. Louis and Chicago had large fairs. Neither had a fair so beautiful. Financially, as well as artistically, the enterprise, which marked a new era in the development of the Pacific, was a success, the total attendance being 3,750,000 persons. Most of our great fairs have closed with a deficit.

The total cost of the exposition was $10,000,000, towards which the United States Government contributed $600,000, the balance being subscribed by the public, the people of Seattle alone taking $2,000,000 worth of stock and bonds in the venture.

The exposition has demonstrated in a most graphic manner the marvelous progress of the great Northwest, where it is estimated that within one thousand miles of Seattle live nearly 8,000,000 people, and has shown the countless opportunities of this part of the world to the tourist, homeseeker, investor, capitalist, the man of moderate means and the man of wealth.

It was the aim of the exposition to correct the common impression that Alaska and Yukon are nothing but countries of cold and gold. On account of the great distances it was manifestly impossible to hold the fair in Alaska, so 250 acres were laid out adjoining one of the many beautiful residence districts of Seattle, on the gentle slopes and terraces overlooking Puget Sound, Lake Washington and Lake Union. The unsurpassed stretches of water front on both lakes afforded great opportunities for aquatic features. A United States life-saving station gave practical exhibitions of its work, and a submarine boat frolicked in the waters of Lake Union.

Twelve large exhibit buildings form the nucleus of the exposition. Around these clustered the State, Territorial and Concessions buildings, the foreign pavilions, the Administration group and smaller structures. Twenty-one States exhibited their resources, and in the foreign exhibit twenty-four countries featured their products. The grounds were twenty minutes' ride from the business centre of Seattle, and were scenically one of the finest exposition sites ever laid out. The snow-clad Olympic and Cascade ranges of mountains were in plain view from all points. In the distance stood Mount Rainier, the highest mountain in the United States.

Some of the peculiar attractions of the exposition are worth recapitulating. One of the main features of the show was the Court of Honor, around which the entire exposition was built. This comprised the Exposition Monument, Cascade Court and Geyser basin. The monument was a Corinthian column supporting an ornamental shaft carrying an astronomical globe, upon which was perched an American eagle. The shaft was eighty feet high and entirely covered with pure gold from Alaska and Yukon Territories. At the base were four figures emblematic of the Northland, the South Pacific countries, the Pacific Coast and the South Seas.

It required $7,000 worth of gold-dust to decorate the monument. At night thousands of incandescent lamps illuminated the shaft, producing a beautiful effect.

The Seattle Exposition will go down in history as an exposition of flowers. Never anywhere in the last decade—neither at Paris, nor at Buffalo, nor Jamestown, nor St. Louis—have we seen such beautiful results of the landscape gardener's art as here. For example, when you passed through the main gates of the exposition, you found at either side a

Service Prompted by Love

TEXT—Gal. 5 : 13
"By love serve one another"

THE text is a short one, consisting of only five words; but if it were universally observed it would revolutionize the world. It enjoins a duty, and suggests the motive that should influence us in the discharge of that duty. The duty is service, the motive is love.

The duty is one that devolves upon men from the very nature of the case, for man is a dependent being. He is dependent, in the first place, upon his Maker for every blessing that he enjoys, for it is the living God who is the author of every good and perfect gift and who giveth us richly all things to enjoy.

But, under God, man is further dependent upon his fellow-man for happiness and prosperity in life. He comes into the world a helpless babe, who would perish in the very article of birth were it not for the kindly offices of others, and during the tender years of infancy he requires constant and watchful care. Though so much more noble than the brute in his origin, his attributes and his destiny, yet his dependence, both in its degree and in its continuance, far exceeds that of the brute creation. Nor does this dependence cease with the years of infancy and childhood. The truth is that human society is bound together by a network of mutual dependence, and every man, without exception, from the cradle to the grave, in the strength of manhood as well as in the feebleness of infancy, needs and must have and does have, in greater or less degree, the co-operation and assistance of his fellow-men in the promotion of his interests, without which life would be not only unendurable but impossible.

The Spirit of Selfishness

This assertion holds good with reference to all the ordinary pursuits of life, which are, for the most part, carried on in a spirit of selfishness. Take for example the relation of master and servant, of employer and employee. The servant is dependent upon his employer for the labor, whose remuneration puts bread into his mouth; and the employer is equally dependent upon the servant for the results of labor, that puts money into his purse. If the employer fails, the servant suffers from the stoppage of his daily earnings. And so, on the other hand, if the servant ceases his work, the employer suffers from the cessation of his profits. The truth of these statements is illustrated by instances that are continually occurring, where, on the one hand, by the insolvency of proprietors, or by conflagration, or other accidents, thousands of laborers are suddenly thrown out of work and deprived of their support; and, on the other hand, by the strike of operatives, industrial pursuits are suspended for a time, greatly to the detriment of proprietors.

Were it necessary, we might go on to prove the truth of the position we have taken by a reference to all the relations in which men stand to one another, and as the result we should find that every man could truthfully say to his neighbor, "I cannot prosper without your aid, nor can you prosper without mine. We are mutually dependent upon one another." Nor would there be any exception. Even the millionaire is as dependent as his poor neighbor. Indeed, he is, in a sense, more dependent, for he has more artificial wants and he is less practised in caring for himself. He is dependent upon his banker for the safe-keeping of his treasures, upon his agent for the honest management of his affairs, and upon the various classes of operatives, from the highest to the lowest, for the performance of services that minister to his bodily comfort and his personal enjoyment.

Our Dependence Upon Each Other

Such, then, is the dependence of man upon man, and when we faithfully discharge the varied duties that we owe to one another we are obeying the injunction of the text to "serve one another."

But in addition to this assistance that men render to one another in the ordinary, every-day pursuits of life, there is another class of acts necessary from man to man, to alleviate the sorrows and increase the happiness of life. In rendering the mutual assistance to which allusion has already been made, men may and generally do act from self-interest only. The laborer serves his employer because his own interests require it, and for every service which he renders he demands an equivalent in the form of wages. In like manner, the master employs his servants because his own interests require it, and for every penny of wages that he pays he demands an equivalent in the form of services rendered.

The Need of Sympathy

Now this exact balancing of obligations is very well to a certain extent. But men are often placed in positions where they are unable to make suitable returns for assistance bestowed, and they have many wants, the relief of which cannot be met on the plan of exact recompense. To meet these constantly recurring cases, acts of kindness and beneficence are necessary, where services are gratuitously rendered, without any expectation of recompense. And in their need of these men are dependent upon one another. In sickness, in bereavement, in poverty, in suffering of any kind, what could man do without the kind offices of his fellow-men? Go to the sickbed, and tell me what would become of the poor sufferer if there were not around him gentle ministers to attend to all his wants—to bathe his fevered brow, to administer the cooling draught or the health-restoring medicine, to speak kind words of hope and sympathize with him in his pains. Go to the hovel of poverty, and tell me what would become of its starving tenants if the hand of charity were not stretched out for their relief. Go to the stately edifices erected to shelter and, as far as may be, cure those who are suffering from the varied ills that flesh is heir to, and tell me what would become of their afflicted inmates if Christian beneficence had not reared for them these asylums.

Nor is it alone when men are reduced to such straits as these that they require acts of kindness from their fellow-men. All men, whether rich or poor, whether in sickness or in health, whether in prosperity or adversity, need the sympathy and kindly aid of their fellow. And when we render this sympathy and aid, contributing to our means to assist those who are in want, wiping the tear of sorrow from the weeping eye, ministering to widow and fatherless, aiding with our influence those who need it, encouraging the downcast with words of hope, stimulating the virtuous with words of approval, reclaiming the vicious by kind reproof and gentle entreaty, helping the brethren by our example, our counsels and our prayers—when we do these things we are obeying the injunction of the text to "serve one another."

The Privilege of Service

And we who profess to be the servants of the Lord Jesus Christ should rejoice in the privilege of being servants of one another. It is this spirit of humility and devotion that the Gospel inculcates. The words of our Saviour are, "Whosoever will be chief among you let him be your servant, even as the Son of man came, not to be ministered unto, but to minister." It was in this title that the apostle Paul delighted, often speaking of himself as the servant of his fellow-men for Christ's sake. Let us not be ashamed, my brethren, to be known as the servants of one another.

But the text, while enjoining this duty, further lays down the principle which is to influence us in the service which we render to others. Love is to be the influencing principle—love for one another. This principle may be wanting, even where the outward service is rendered. Too many acts of service which are very well in themselves, and perhaps of great benefit to the recipient, proceed from defective motives, while love—sincere, disinterested, self-denying love—is wanting. Some serve their fellow-men from the desire to be reputed generous and liberal, and are careful to parade their acts of beneficent service ostentatiously before the world; others, from the fear that they will be regarded mean and stingy, as compared with their neighbors; others, from a mere natural impulse of pity that is awakened by the sight of suffering, but ceases as the sight becomes more familiar. It is too true that selfish and defective motives are at the bottom of most of the services which men perform for one another.

But while this is so, there is a true beneficence proceeding from the noble motive of love. It is this that the text enjoins. As to acts of duty, it adds love to self-interest. As to acts of charity, it substitutes love for the thousand inferior motives that are so apt to influence us.

That we may be influenced by this motive, let us now consider the reasons why it should prompt all the services which we render to one another.

First. If we serve one another by love, we are copying the example of our blessed Saviour, whose we profess to be. Though he was in the form of God, he made himself of no reputation and took upon him the form of a servant. He came to this world to render to fallen men an inestimable service, even to suffer and die for them that they might be saved. And what was it that prompted him to render this service? It was love, pure, unmerited, God-like love for the souls of men. "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us." And his word to us is, "As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you; continue ye in my love." "This is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you."

"Beloved, let the same mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Copy his example, which is held up before you as the standard to which you are to conform. "He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked." And as he, the Son of God and the sharer of the Father's perfections and glory, condescended to become a servant from love for the souls of men, so let us "by love serve one another."

Willing and Cheerful Service

Second. It is only as love is the influencing principle that the services we render to one another are pleasing in the sight of God. We are not to suppose that because we are sinners by nature and by practice, none of our actions are regarded by God with complacency. We are taught in the Scriptures that "the Lord taketh pleasure in his people," and that it is possible for them to perform acts which he will approve and accept, not as the ground of their justification, but as evidences of their regard for his authority and their devotion to his will. Every act of willing obedience to God's commands and of cheerful conformity to Christ's example is pleasing to God. But let us remember that God regards the motive equally with the outward act. We may, rather, say that he regards the motive above the outward act. He looks at the heart and judges the act by the motive which prompted it. The most munificent deeds of charity and the most beneficent acts of self-sacrifice are disregarded by him when they proceed from pride or selfishness, or shame, or fear, or any transient impulse. "Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor," says the apostle, "and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity"—that is, love, as the influencing principle—"it profiteth me nothing."

But when the heart is right, and the motive that of pure love, every service is accepted of God. The ordinary services we render to our fellow-men, in the every-day pursuits of life, become acts of religion and are so regarded by God; and the least kindness we show, even to the giving of a cup of cold water, or the dropping of a mite into the treasury, shall by no means be overlooked or unrewarded. Seeing, then, that this principle is so essential to the acceptance of our good deeds by God, let us, my brethren, "by love serve one another."

Love the Ruling Principle

Third. It is only as love is the influencing principle that acts of service are pleasing to the performer. If we discharge our duties to others merely from necessity or self-interest, and if we do acts of beneficence to others merely because we feel that we ought to, or because we are ashamed to decline, there is to us no pleasure in the act. But we all know from experience how delightful it is to perform services, and even to make sacrifices, for those whom we love; for it is the nature of love to sweeten the labor that is performed for its sake, however arduous, or wearying, or disagreeable in itself this labor may be. Take, for example, the case of a devoted mother, watching day and night, week after week, at the bedside of her sick child; denying herself needed rest and relaxation, literally wearing herself out in the care of her child. Does she begrudge the sacrifice she is making, or feel that her

PRESIDENTS MEET ON THE BORDER

EUROPEAN rulers quite frequently take tours into one another's territories, making visits of some duration. Edward VII. of Great Britain goes every year to France and to Austria for his health, and to rest from the cares of state as well as from the round of country-house visits which fall to the lot of the British sovereign. Emperor William, on his yachting trips, frequently drops in for a chat with the King of Denmark, the King of Sweden, or Haakon of Norway. The Presidents of the United States, Mexico, and other countries on this side of the Atlantic, however, have kept within their borders during their terms of office until recently. In fact, as our chief executives had not stepped without their own frontiers until the last administration, it had become a popular though mistaken idea that they were forbidden to do so by some interpretation of the Constitution or some legal enactment. President Roosevelt was the first one to disregard the tradition when the need for observing the custom was not apparent. When he went to the American Canal Zone, at Panama, he left the zone for a few hours while he took lunch with the President of Panama. President Taft is the second President who has stepped upon alien soil, exchanging visits across the Rio Grande with the President of Mexico.

President Taft was on his way back to Washington from his extensive tour of the West, which had reached as far as the Pacific Coast, and it was arranged that while he stopped at the hustling, bustling Texan city of El Paso President Diaz of Mexico should come up to Juarez, just across the line, and that they should exchange visits between the two places.

The city of El Paso "did itself proud" in the number and elaborateness of its decorations. Public buildings, stores and private residences flaunted bunting and flags from banner staves and cornices. In neighborly proximity to the red, white and blue could be seen the colors of Mexico, bearing the eagle with the serpent in its beak and claws. The streets were thronged long before either of the Presidents arrived, for the railroads were running special trains into the city and the people came in from all over Texas and parts of northern Mexico, and a picturesque crowd it was—a crowd such as could be gathered only in this part of Uncle Sam's dominions. There were cowboys without number, in sombreros, with faces tanned as red as an Indian's by constant exposure to sun and wind on the great prairies; there were miners, engineers who are developing the wonderful natural resources of this part of the State, tourists from the North and East, Mexicans from across the line, wearing high-peaked, broad-brimmed hats, and with a blanket draped gracefully around the shoulders; and last, but far from least, were the people of El Paso, who had made the elaborate preparations for the exchange of international felicitations.

Among those who had gathered to give official welcome was Governor Campbell of Texas, who had made as extensive an alteration in his usual appearance as the city itself. In other words, the popular Governor had purchased a high silk hat, and he was reported to have said that he would wear it through the memorable day if it killed him. He usually appears in a comfortable broad-brimmed, slouched hat of felt, which might be called the State headgear of Texas.

The President went to the Chamber of Commerce to receive President Diaz, who came as far as the border line in a gorgeous, gilded State coach. He then changed to an American carriage, and most of his military escort waited, while American soldiers became his guards. As he was driven into El Paso the waiting crowds caught sight of a white-haired, military looking man, with a strong face, wearing a general's chapeau and dressed in a uniform resplendent with orders and decorations. He seemed pleased at the "Viva Diaz!" which sprang from a thousand throats, and lifted his hat gracefully in response. He was greeted first by the President's military aid, Captain Butt.

President Taft received him in an ante-room of the Chamber of Commerce, and the meeting between the two was most cordial. Mr. Taft was dressed in the conventional frock coat, and was in striking contrast to the Mexican President. A short time after Diaz had returned to Juarez, President Taft crossed the border into Mexico, and received an enthusiastic welcome from the Mexicans, who packed the streets, and evidently wished to outdo the Americans in warmth of welcome. He entered the Custom House, where Diaz was waiting, and found the building converted into a palace as if by a fairy hand. After a short call Mr. Taft returned to El Paso, only to go back a second time to Juarez for the state banquet in the evening, given by President Diaz. There were one hundred and fifty guests, and the speeches made were very cordial and dwelt on the increased friendliness which would come from the meetings at El Paso and Juarez.

Mr. Taft found time during his stay at El Paso to review the school children, and a military and civic parade five miles long, and attend a breakfast given by the business men. If his stay there could not be designated as strenuous there is no other word that will answer. Later he spent several days at his brother's ranch, where frock coats and high hats could be laid aside, and he could eat a dinner without giving a speech as the last thing on the menu.

Ex-President Roosevelt and the Missionaries of the Sotik District, Africa

WHILE on one of his hunting excursions in Africa, Mr. Roosevelt, with his son Kermit, accepted a cordial invitation from the workers of the Africa Inland Mission to pay them a visit. He came to the mission while en route to the Sotik district, after a successful hunt for big game on the Kapiti plains. In honor of their distinguished guests the missionaries erected an awning, hung it with American flags and put up a board flooring. The ex-President was warmly welcomed by Frederick McKendriek and his missionary associates, with their wives and children, and an al fresco luncheon was served. Mr. Roosevelt made a brief speech, in the course of which he said: "I am immensely interested in this country and its possibilities as an abode for white men. Very large tracts are fit for a fine population and healthy and prosperous settlements, and it would be a calamity to neglect them. I am convinced that this country has a great agricultural and industrial future, and it is the most attractive playground in the world. It most certainly presents excellent openings for capitalists, and ample inducements should be offered them to come here. The homemaker and actual settler, and not the speculator, should be encouraged in making this a white man's country. It is natural that I should have a peculiarly good feeling for the settlers. They remind me of the white men in our West, with whom I worked, and with whose aspirations I so deeply sympathize." Mr. Roosevelt promised to return later, and lay the cornerstone for a new building for the Mission.

SERVICE PROMPTED BY LOVE

Sermon by Rev. H. B. Chapin, D.D.

labors are an unwelcome burden? Ah, no! Her service is to her a pleasure, for her life is bound up in the life of her child.

Now, as our mutual dependence makes it necessary for us to bestow as well as receive, and as the needs of our fellow-men render it obligatory on us to perform constant service, and we cannot escape the alternative, how desirable it is that this succession of services be pleasing rather than disagreeable to us! That it may be so, let us "by love serve one another."

Fourth. Where love is the influencing principle, every service that we render is more acceptable and profitable to the recipient. It is possible to render services and bestow favors in such a way as to remind the recipient of his dependence and so wound his sensibilities that, instead of manifesting any gratitude for the aid bestowed, he rather wishes it had been withheld. He who renders a service or bestows a favor grudgingly does it with a harshness and repulsiveness that makes the recipient loath to accept the proffered gift. He who gives proudly and ostentatiously does it with such an air of superiority and such an exposure of the poverty of the recipient as to crush his already bruised spirit. He who performs any service for his fellow-men superciliously or ill-naturedly, however important the service may be, acts in such a way as to neutralize all the good he might do, and awaken in the heart of the recipient dislike both for the benefactor and for the service. But where there is the gentleness and the tenderness, and the kindness and the earnestness of love, how acceptable is the service! If it be in itself a grateful service, the mode of its performance makes it doubly grateful. And if it be in itself an unwelcome service, even to the correcting of evil or the rebuking of sin, the gracious manner of its performance robs it of its sting and ensures its acceptance. Of such beneficence we may truly say,

> It droppeth as the gentle rain of heaven
> Upon the place beneath; it is twice blessed;
> It blesseth him that gives and him that takes.

As we thus consider how pleasing to the recipient, as well as to the performer, love makes every service, let us by love serve one another.

Fifth. Finally, it is only where love is the influencing principle that our services will be constant. For the love which the Gospel enjoins is no transient impulse that requires strong incitements to bring it into exercise, and that passes away like the morning cloud or the early dew. Nor is it an unworthy feeling, like pride, or selfishness, or fear, that brings forth fruit only under certain circumstances and anon loses its prevailing power. Christian love is a fixed, abiding, unchanging principle, deeply implanted in the renewed heart and constantly prompting to acts of service. Indeed, it makes these acts of service, in a sense, spontaneous. There is nothing forced about them. They flow as naturally as the purling rivulet flows from the bubbling fountain. Hence he who possesses this principle never wearies in well-doing, and constantly seeks for opportunities of doing good, and is ever ready to deny himself for the sake of others, for "charity suffereth long and is kind; charity beareth all things, hopeth all things, believeth all things, endureth all things." As we thus see how necessary love is to perseverance in well doing, let us, my brethren, by love serve one another.

As I remarked at the outset, if this short text were universally observed it would revolutionize society; for it would turn this earth into a paradise; heaven would be begun below. Have you ever thought, dear friends, what this world would be if all men loved one another, and in the exercise of love served one another? Selfishness, unkindness, hatred, dishonesty, injustice, oppression, war, bloodshed—there would be no room for these words in the dictionary, for there would be nothing in the world for them to describe; bolts and bars, reformatories and prisons would be no longer needed; grasping monopolies and grinding competition would cease to exist; the great conflict between capital and labor would be forever settled.

Would to God that we could constrain all men to act in accordance with this blessed principle of love! But with God's help one thing we can do: we can constrain ourselves. Let us, then, henceforth "by love serve one another." Let us faithfully discharge the duties, both temporal and spiritual, that we owe to our fellow-men. Let us be abundant in acts of kindness, bearing one another's burdens, and so fulfilling the law of Christ. Let us put away all envyings and disputings, all hatred and malice, all coldness and selfishness, and "put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness," for "the end of the commandment is charity, out of a pure heart and a good conscience and faith unfeigned." So shall the world be brighter and happier and better because we have lived in it, and great shall be our reward, both here and hereafter.

MEDALS FOR YOUTHFUL HEROES

IT was a thrilling scene which was enacted in the New York City Hall the other day, when medals and certificates were awarded there to seventy-five heroes and heroines who had been instrumental in saving human life.

The awards were in three classes: silver medals for those who had risked their lives in making rescues; bronze medals for those who had exerted themselves nobly, though not to the limit of life-risk; and certificates of honor. Those who had made more than one rescue had for each a bar attached to his medal. These tokens are provided by the city, and are awarded by the United States Volunteer Life-Saving Corps to its members. Those who are ineligible to membership, as boys under age and girls or women, are also given rewards by the corps when they perform rescues.

James R. Howe, the president of the corps, who had been introduced by Mr. McGowan, president of the Board of Aldermen, expressed the gratitude of his organiaztion for the co-operation of the city. Alderman Doull read the records of the feat of each candidate, as he stepped forward, and W. E. Longfellow pinned on the tokens, which will be cherished through life by the recipients and handed down to their descendants.

Applause greeted each, but in the report of a New York paper we are told that a few of the records aroused especial enthusiasm. One of these was given to Mamie Kavanaugh, fifteen years old, who, on August 3, 1908, saved from drowning in Jamaica Bay a twelve-year-old boy. Little Herbert Elder was another to receive an especial ovation. He seems a mere child, but declares that he is thirteen years old. His daring deed was the rescue from drowning of Gladys Godklin, on September 2, 1908, at South Beach. He said, in response to a question, that he had known how to swim "'most as long as he had known how to walk."

A city policeman and a fireman, both being members of the corps, were awarded medals of honor. Naturally, neither Miss Kavanaugh nor Herbert Elder is a member. Neither is Hannah Seligsohn, who received a medal for saving a drowning man on May 26, 1906. Three men by the name of Levy were among this honorable band. It will be seen that our Hebrew fellow-citizens figured prominently in this interesting ceremony.

Giving Medals to Youthful Heroes in City Hall, New York

It has been surmised by some of our theorists that the enervating influences of civilization would crush out from the human heart the grand impulses of heroism. Such ideas fall flat before exhibitions like that just described. A great British general was ridiculed for pinning his faith upon the highly-groomed and daintily-clad regiments which one day passed before him in review.

"They are puppies," remarked a rude bystander.

"But I can tell you that those puppies fight well," he retorted, sharply.

So it is with the human product of our modern civilization. Given right ideals and cultivated self-control, the men, and even the children, of to-day will excel in heroism all the generations of the past.

For this handful of men and women in the New York City Hall the other day are merely specimens of the great army of heroes and heroines, who, though most of them are hidden from the public view, are daily sacrificing themselves in one way or another for their fellow-men. From the Golden Gate of the West, or eastward over the arid plains and throughout the rocky fastnesses of the central backbone of the continent, on to the crowded cities of the Middle West and the Atlantic seaboard, every day the soldiers of this splendid army are doing deeds of courage, often in silence and obscurity, but all the more grandly for that.

Amid the selfishness and the sordidness, of which there is still far too much among us, the noble conduct of these devoted and fearless men and women shines like a star of hope and inspiration to others. They foreshadow the millennium, and their number is bound to increase; for, whether or not they acknowledge the sovereignty of our Great Master, their spirit is his Spirit, and they are doing their part to hasten the day when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea; and every one among us shall stand ready to give his life, if need be, in the service of his fellow-men.

SPREADING THE GOSPEL IN DARK KOREA

THE readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be interested in the first effort ever made, so far as I can learn, to put a copy of the Gospels into the hands of every one in Korea—this land where God has so signally blessed our work.

When I first landed in Korea I was impressed with the fact that Standard Oil seemed to be known and used in every village of the land, and sold in nearly every store. As I passed along the streets I would pass coolie after coolie carrying water, most of them in large five-gallon oil cans.

It set me to planning how we could get the Word of God as widely known and distributed. After prayer and counsel with other missionaries, we decided to begin a systematic effort to put a copy of the Gospel, with several tracts setting forth the plan of salvation in a way to catch the ear of this people, into every home. This work is being done systematically, village by village and county by county. Records are kept of the work, and it is through the agency of native Christians who are selected by the missionaries in charge on the field. These men preach as they go, and carry along Bibles to sell to those inquiring more fully.

Hundreds of Christians in Korea have been led to Christ through reading some tract or Gospel given out in the market places or purchased by some one out of curiosity. We believe that God will bless this systematic effort to thoroughly disseminate his truth by adding untold numbers to the Church. There are hundreds of thousands of Japanese coming into Korea, and they are thickly settled in all the principal towns. They are the more adventurous, the "crowded-out" population of Japan, and they come with loose views of morals and life. These need to have the Gospel in their own tongue, and we are attempting to do the same for these as we do for the Koreans.

A Heathen Funeral in Korea

The Bible Society has made it possible for us to put these Gospels out for one-half cent each. With these native Christians to do the work, we can put a Gospel, with several tracts, into each home at a total cost of about one cent per home. When God has enabled us to give these people the Gospel in their own language, and at such a trifling cost as this, should we not, as Christians redeemed by his blood, rise and spread abroad the knowledge of Christ until every one shall know him? He has promised that his Word shall not return to him void but shall accomplish that which he pleases and prosper in the thing whereto he has sent it.

If any of your readers become personally interested in this work they may write to the secretary of the Southern Presbyterian Foreign Missions, Rev. S. H. Chester, D.D., Nashville, Tenn. Sincerely yours in His name, R. T. COIT.

ACTIVITIES IN VARIOUS CHRISTIAN FIELDS

—REV. CHARLES STELZLE has become the lecturer and head of the department of Christian Sociology in the Bible Teachers' Training School in the city of New York.

—THE MEETING of the National Inter-Church Temperance Council will be held in the Y. M. C. A. Building, Indianapolis, Ind., November 9 and 10. Eight denominations have united for the furtherance of this reform.

—MRS. EMMA DAVENPORT, of Carson City, Mich., has written enough poems and hymns on Bible topics to fill a volume. Her songs have been used successfully at Gospel meetings. Mrs. Davenport is an active Sunday School worker.

—PRESIDENT STOOKSBURY, of Lincoln University, writes: "Our school is larger this year than ever before, and is still growing. We have to turn away a number of young men because we have not the work to furnish them. There are scores of young men in this mountainous country anxious to go to school and work to pay their expenses. We have part of the machinery for a broom factory and $250 in cash donated. We still need $750 in cash to complete the broom factory."

—EVANGELIST WILLIAM D. LAUMASTER, of Danville, Pa., inaugurated a series of services at Gorsuch M. E. Church, Washington, D. C. (Rev. W. L. Lynn, pastor), on Sunday, October 17. The Gorsuch M. E. Church honored Mr. William R. Hunt, its recording steward, recently with a public testimonial in recognition of his fifty years' service with the church. Brother Hunt joined Gorsuch October 15, 1859, and has been its leading spirit for many years, having been recording steward and exhorter for forty years and superintendent of the Sunday School for the last forty-seven years.

—WILFRED T. GRENFELL, the missionary explorer, writes from Labrador: "It is my custom to carry on my vessel a lot of literature, which I distribute to the fishermen. I have just been giving out bundles to the many schooners fishing in this out-of-the-world place. They are north of all mail steamers, and get no chance of papers for three months, nor do they bring down books. Your paper, with its breezy and interesting short articles, its popular illustrations and its religious tone, is very popular among them. Could your readers and subscribers keep their old numbers, and every now and again send us a box full? Being old numbers makes no difference to us. They could be sent to me, addressed to Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, St. John's, Newfoundland, or to care of Miss White, 14 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass."

AMONG THE MOSLEMS OF MOROCCO

By EDWIN F. FREASE, D.D.

Superintendent, American Mission in North Africa

MOHAMMEDANISM is the great present-day missionary problem. Over against the marvelous successes won and being won by the missionary force in heathen and pagan lands is the startling fact that the 225,000,000 Mohammedans, occupying the geographical centre of the missionary situation, opposing Christianity in Europe, Asia, Africa and Malaysia, have remained practically untouched by the missionary propaganda. Modern Islam is increasingly militant. The Pan-Islamic movement aims at Mohammedan world supremacy, politically and religiously, and is organizing for it. The active propaganda in Africa, India and elsewhere, and many other things, show that Islam is not merely on the defensive against Christianity, but is aggressively attacking it.

Dr. Post, of Beirut, says that "We have got to conquer them or they will conquer us. . . . We must Christianize these people or they will march over their deserts, and they will sweep like a fire that shall devour our Christianity and destroy it." Dr. George Adam Smith declares that "the great work to which the providence of God summons the church in the second century of modern missions is that of evangelizing the Mohammedans."

"In the Moslem mind, Morocco ranks next to Arabia as an orthodox country," and in North Africa is the headquarters of the Senusi Brotherhood, the Jesuit Order of Islam, said to be the "true head of modern Islam's hostile movement against the giaour, or infidel." Less than a century ago, the Barbary States defied Europe by their piracies in the Mediterranean, held European Christian slaves, and were extreme in their fanatical intolerance. No Christian work was possible there. The change began with the exploits of the American Navy against them. In 1830 the French took Algiers; in a series of campaigns subdued it, and to-day Algeria is a department of the French republic; Tunisia is a French protectorate, and Tripoli and Morocco are increasingly under French influence.

With French laws, freedom of worship, education, stable government, conditions have revolutionized. A million Europeans, mostly French, now live in Algeria and Tunisia. Algiers, with but 37,000 Moslems among 175,000 population; Tunis, with 100,000 Moslems among 250,000; Oran, Bone, Constantine, and other towns, are modern European cities. French and Italian farms dot the valleys of the coast strip. It is the end of a continent in transition. Defeated in battle, under French law, rubbing against Christian peoples, the fanatical intolerance of the Mohammedans there has been wonderfully modified.

The establishment, therefore, of the American Mission in North Africa, including Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Tripoli, is a new and direct attack on one of the Moslem strongholds, made possible by the changed conditions. It came about in this way: More than half of the delegates to the World's Sunday School Convention, held at Rome in May, 1907, were from the United States. Going by way of Gibraltar, these delegates visited Algiers, where Bishop J. C. Hartzell, Missionary Bishop for Africa, had arranged, at the request of the president of the World's Sunday School Association, for a missionary meeting. The delegates were startled to find that, although the United Presbyterian Church of this country and the Church Missionary Society of the Church of England have long had work in Egypt, the only missionary work done in Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Tripoli had been by independent missionaries and the North Africa Mission, a British undenominational organization, which has done useful pioneer work but has organized no churches. Convinced that some great church should at once enter this great field, meetings were held on the ship and at Rome, attended by Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, and representatives of other denominations, and action was taken appealing to Bishop Hartzell to undertake, for his church, to do so. The Bishop said that it would require $25,000 a year for five years to attempt it. Subscriptions were made amounting to $50,000, payable in five yearly instalments. The ensuing November, the board authorized the opening of the mission, though unable to make an appropriation then. But Bishop Hartzell was so impressed by the providential indications, and the result of investigations made by Mrs. Hartzell and himself, that he opened the work, believing that God would furnish additional means in due time. Three experienced missionaries in Tunis identified themselves with the new movement and two in Algiers, and two new missionaries have since been added. The writer and Mrs. Frease go to the field in January, 1910.

Kabyle Girls and Women of the Industrial School at Djemaa Sahridj

In a preliminary trip of inspection, mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for April 21, 1909, I was surprised and more than gratified by the conditions and outlook. In Tunis, regular and encouraging work is being done among Moslem and Jewish men, and the women missionaries have classes for Moslem women and girls, and visit about one hundred Mohammedan households—a really wonderful work. In Algiers one hundred and fifty French women and girls are in the classes, many of whom have been brightly converted. The same number of Kabyle Moslem women and girls regularly attend the classes, and a number of them have found the Saviour. In twenty-two years of missionary experience I have seen no more encouraging or remarkable city work—and it is among Moslems!

The Berbers, or Kabyles, are undoubtedly the key to the Moslem situation in North Africa, and possibly, even probably, to the whole Moslem problem. They are the descendants of the race formed when the Teutonic Vandals crossed from Spain to North Africa in the fifth century, and subdued and intermingled with the descendants of the Phœnician Carthaginians and others. The European strain evidently predominates, as the present Berbers, or Kabyles, are distinctly a white race. They were a part of the great North African Christian Church when the Mohammedan Arabs swept it away in the seventh century. Forced into the mountain fastnesses, the Berbers became Moslems, but always have hated the Arabs. They have traditions of once having been Christians, and are less bigoted than the Arabs. Sturdy, brave and industrious, they are very different from the lazy, shiftless Arab. There are those who believe the Arab will fade away before the march of civilization, but that the Berbers will develop into the indigenous ruling race. They number to-day 9,000,000, to 8,000,000 Arabs, in the four countries mentioned.

Hence one would expect the Berber to be the most reachable of Moslems. It is the united testimony of the missionaries of North Africa that he is. This was confirmed by visits to two mission centres at opposite sides of Grand Kabylia, the beautiful mountain region east of Algiers, and painstaking inquiries from the scattered missionaries in other parts, almost all of whom I met.

From El Maten, perched high on a mountain slope, from which fifty towns can be seen, I accompanied the French missionary, Jean Paul Cook, to a number of villages. Respectful, interested, orderly attention was given to the preaching. Mr. Cook said that, only a very few years ago, open scorn and stone-throwing would have been our portion. This change has taken place all over the province, the missionaries say. Nowhere else can the Gospel be preached to the Moslem as here, save possibly in

A Strong, Clear Note

ONE of the soundest of our theologians is Dr. William H. P. Faunce, president of Brown University. Dr. Faunce has been a close observer of all that has taken place in recent theological discussion. Unlike many others, he has not plunged hotly into the battle, but has calmly awaited developments. He now reviews the recent attacks upon the Bible in an able article contributed to Van Norden's, which contains many striking passages. Here are a few that deserve to be remembered:

"I want to say—and I think no educator would dispute the saying—that familiarity with the sixty-six pamphlets, or letters, we call the Bible is worth more than a knowledge of any other sixty-six pamphlets and letters chosen out of all the centuries and all nations.

"Our Bible was meant to grapple with the conscience of the world, to 'have dominion over the earth and subdue it.'

"We do not want a Bible modernized and mitigated, diluted and sterilized. We want it in full, rugged virility, with all its unshorn strength, and its brutal rebukes of brutality, and its stout blows at stout-hearted and defiant sin. An eviscerated Bible is a lifeless cadaver.

"We shall forever need the New Testament—the only source of our knowledge of the ethics by which Jesus lived, and the religious convictions which he cherished. We shall find the Old Testament indispensable: to teach us patience in all great endeavor; to teach us the beauty of the physical world about us, and to teach us patriotism and civic virtue."

Strong words and true, from a strong man! What a contrast they present to the utterances of the weak-kneed theologians who are swayed by every wind of doctrine, and with whom nothing is steadfast—not even God's unchangeable Word.

A Practical Peacemaker

IN London, a few weeks ago, there passed away an American who, though little known outside of what has been called the "charmed circle" of diplomacy, was yet one of the most remarkable men of his time. William Insco Buchanan, an Ohio farmer's boy, with a common country school education, had in him the qualities that belong to real greatness. He was middle-aged before his peculiar abilities began to be appreciated, but soon the promoters of great enterprises learned to know him as one who could be depended upon to carry through to success plans and schemes that seemed well-nigh impossible to others. It was his organizing and administrative brain that successfully produced the four corn palaces at Sioux City, and gave order and character to the exhibits at the Columbian Exposition, and other great fairs.

In 1894, Mr. Buchanan was appointed as American Minister to the Argentine Republic, and, by a strange chance, it proved that in that comparatively obscure post he found opportunity for the highest exercise of his wonderful talents. All his life Mr. Buchanan had been an advocate of peace. He understood what a large part national jealousy, pride and sentiment had in international troubles, and he appealed to the reason of men and not to their emotions and prejudices. He held firmly to the doctrine that nothing is ever really settled by physical force or violence and that no misunderstanding could possibly arise between any two governments which could not be adjusted by reaching a mutual agreement on the basis of law and arbitration. Consequently, when Chile and Argentina were about to be embroiled in war over a boundary dispute, he was sought out by the few who knew his rare powers and was soon invited by the two governments to adjust their differences. He settled the dispute peaceably and satisfactorily; but he did more. He succeeded in convincing them of the folly and extravagance of their big military establishments, and persuaded them, without a hint of coercion, to sign a treaty of disarmament. Thereafter, the shrewd and far-seeing Ohioan became the adviser of every Southern power when trouble arose. His last diplomatic triumph was the peaceful settlement of the trouble with Venezuela.

A great and good man, the best type of diplomat, a true follower of the Prince of Peace and worthy of all honor, was William I. Buchanan.

The National Health

HARDLY a season passes without an epidemic scare of some sort. This year, tuberculosis is selected by the sensational publications as the regular annual bugaboo. It was asserted that the increase in the number of cases this year was appalling, and figures, more or less conjectural, were given to show the imminence of the danger in New York and other populous centres. Now, the Bureau of Vital Statistics in Washington pricks this sensational nonsense with its bulletin 104, on mortality returns for the past year, which show a decided decrease in the deaths from tuberculosis. In 1907 the mortality rate per 10,000 from that disease was 183.6, last year it was 173.9, and the current year promises to show a still further reduction. This is, no doubt, largely the effect of the excellent work done in nearly all the States, which have been fighting the disease on the advanced scientific lines suggested by the International Congress on Tuberculosis a year ago. That we are making substantial headway against the "great white plague" is evident; but the battle must be kept up with all the resources at our command if we mean to stamp it out permanently.

An Echo from the Past

MOST small boys have a period in their existence which could be called the pirate period, when they have a strong desire to run away to sea and scuttle ships and find buried treasure. This is either preceded or followed by the Indian period, when they manifest a strong desire to run away West and scalp Indians. It always seems to be a great disappointment when the boy, in the Indian period, finds that the red man is going to school at Carlisle and raising "bumper crops" in Oklahoma; also that the pirates have disappeared from the West Indies.

The news therefore that a pirate has appeared in "a long black schooner"—things long and black seem to belong as a trademark to the Society of Associated Pirates—at some point off the Bahamas will be hailed with amazement by people of 1909, who will wonder if their eyes have not deceived them as they see the reports on the printed page. The captain of the British ship Phelen reports that he was attacked by a piratical schooner near the Bahamas, and a revenue cutter, it is said, has gone in search of the craft which went into the pirate business a century too late.

It is an anachronism to have Captain Kidds and Blackbeards at the present day. It may be that, in the coming years of the aeroplane, there will develop for a time some freebooters of the air, who will prey upon the earth below from sky-raking airships, and that aerial police will sail after in hot pursuit. The Bahamian pirate is not up to date in his methods evidently, and will cause little damage before the revenue men persuade him that there are safer professions in the present age.

A Premier as a Scapegoat

THE fate of an empire has sometimes hung upon a single life. When the Spanish government decided to execute Francisco Ferrer, who had been adjudged guilty of inciting the recent revolt in Barcelona, it took a tremendous risk. There was apparently but slight evidence against Ferrer. He was a director of the Modern School in Barcelona, where his teaching of sociology, which was in line with that of the Western European schools, was regarded as revolutionary. Three years ago he was arrested on a charge of complicity in a plot against King Alfonso's life, but after a long trial was acquitted. It is claimed by Ferrer's friends that the recent accusation of fomenting the Barcelona disturbances was trumped up against the professor by the old-fashioned Conservative leaders, who hated him for his modern teaching and his sympathy for the masses. He is less heroized in Spain than elsewhere, for at home he was not regarded as having the qualities of a leader, being simply a teacher of revolutionary doctrine. But in his summary taking off, without regard to law, justice or public sentiment, Spain made a capital blunder. Alfonso, perceiving the dangerous drift, has thrown the blame for the Ferrer episode on Premier Maura, who resigned in disgrace, giving way to Señor Moret, a Liberal, who is now at the head of a new cabinet of moderate Liberals. It will be fortunate for Spain if this political move should succeed in placating public opinion. There are political ghosts which, like that of Banquo, "will not down."

GENERAL NOTES

—ST. LOUIS HAS a pastor who believes in going right into Satan's own quarters to find sinners. The Rev. Jacob E. Meeker has inaugurated in the Western city what is known as the "beer-garden sermon." He visits theatres, dance-halls, etc., always accompanied by a number of his congregation, and he has never yet been denied a welcome. He usually speaks about twenty minutes. Pastor Meeker believes the day is not far distant when our people will outgrow the saloon and when great neighborhood social centres, with the church as projector and director, will take its place.

—SOME TIME AGO we noted the discovery in Germany of fossil human remains which, according to the scientists, belonged to a very remote period. Recently, another important discovery was made by Dr. Schoetensack at Maur, near Heidelberg, being a part of the skeleton of a man of still greater antiquity. The remains were found in a pre-glacial deposit, and are claimed to be the oldest yet discovered. That they are human is regarded as indisputable. This Heidelberg exhumation, according to the scientific view, while it greatly increases the presumptive antiquity of the race, also disposes effectually of the claims of the Darwinians, for it is now admitted that no anthropoid stage preceded the period in which the Heidelberg man must have lived. All the marks are clearly human; the dentition is positively so, forming a striking contrast to anthropoid dentition. Moreover, the pre-glacial grave yields evidences that the men of those dimly distant days buried their dead and placed beside them weapons and tools of flint. These were significant of a belief in a future life, even in that early age of the world.

—WIDE PUBLICITY has been given to a report that the Free Masons of the globe intend to rebuild Solomon's temple. It would be a mighty undertaking. Solomon built it in seven years, and the construction of Herod's temple occupied forty-six years. Solomon's temple was on the hill Moriah, a ridge a little east of the city, and the traditional site of the place where Ahraham put Isaac on the altar for sacrifice. In David's day it was a farmer's threshing floor, until he purchased it from Ornan, the owner. Three temples have stood on this sacred ground in succession; then, in the second century A.D., a heathen temple was reared, which in 600 A.D. gave place to Justinian's Church. Next followed the graceful "Dome of the Rock," built in Caliph Omar's time, which has alternately been in Crusader and Moslem hands. To Mohammedans, who revere all the Hebrew patriarchs, the Haram-esh-Schereef, as the temple site is now called, is held almost as sacred as Mecca. Will they sell it now, after long centuries of possession? Many changes may take place under the new liberal regime in Turkey, but this, if it did happen, would certainly be one of the most surprising.

Soul Voyage to Nirvana

ADDED to the gorgeous spectacular, costly, prolonged burial services of the Empress Dowager of China was the most solemn ceremony of sending her spirit by ship recently to the haven of the heavenly Nirvana. A boat was constructed, at a cost of $35,000, which was built of bamboo covered with silk paper, and was sumptuously carved and fitted out. On the bow stood a huge figure representing the guiding spirit of heaven, and just behind it was the imperial yellow chair. On the deck were four pavilions, the first containing effigies of twenty-five court ladies of her majesty's train; the second, a number of robes actually worn by the empress; the third, effigies of priests, and the fourth the imperial throne. In addition to the vessel itself, there was built in front of it a splendid kiosk, for the reception of the spirit on landing. The torch was set to the kiosk first, and the flames spread from it to the bows of the boat, until the whole costly structure was entirely consumed, and the spirit of the dead queen was sent across the mystic river to her everlasting rest. Thus the Buddhist faith did the last and best thing it could for her: granted final deliverance of her soul from transmigration and the miseries of this world, and conveyed it into the realm of everlasting forgetfulness. Believing that her soul was a small cup holding a little of the Deity, Buddhism took it over the mystic river and emptied it into the fathomless abyss of the infinite, where it was immediately absorbed and sank into everlasting nothingness. What a great difference there is between the annihilation of the spirit of the empress, under ceremonies so costly and spectacular, and the immortality which Christ gives to the humblest servant and most conspicuous ruler who is faithful to his cause, and how necessary it is for those who believe in the blessed realities of an after life to carry the good news to the millions whose only heaven now is an eternal nothingness!

But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel. (II. Tim. 1 : 10.)

Servants Rewarded

Thomas Barber Kerr, of New York, after having provided in his will liberally for his family, left $10,000 to Mary Keegan, an old and faithful servant, who had been in his home for thirty years, $1,000 each to all servants who had been with the family for more than ten years, and $500 each to those employed for more than five. This was a fitting recognition of services faithfully rendered, which contributed so much to the health and happiness of himself and family. The servant problem is one of the most perplexing in American social life. There is an almost unending amount of friction and unrest, which seem to be growing worse each year; sometimes it is the fault of the master and mistress, and sometimes the servant is to blame. Large houses and ample fortunes, and the products of every clime, minister to the palate, but there is incompetency and indolence and insolence on the one hand, and parsimony, petulance, impatience and unreasonable demand on the other, and the higher the social circles and the larger the incomes and number of servants the greater seems to be the difficulty. The spirit and action of Mr. Kerr would have a tendency to secure and retain the right kind of servants and bring about the harmony in the culinary and other departments of the home so necessary. This remembrance of servants in a financial reward is comparatively rare, and yet our heavenly Father rewards his humblest servant with everything which is necessary for his material support in this life, and gives him a title to an inheritance on the other side of the grave.

Let the Lord be magnified, which hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant. (Ps. 35 : 27.)

Four Thousand Miles of Pies

The strike of 200 bakers in New York City recently, because the proprietors would not pay each a dollar a week more in wages, caused a famine among the pie-eaters of the city and called attention to the enormous consumption of pies of various kinds in the city. One hundred thousand pies a day are eaten in New York City alone. These would make a line thirteen miles long, and in the course of a year it would stretch between four and five thousand miles, from New York to San Francisco and half way back again. It is hard to estimate the quantity of materials needed for this output. For apple pies alone, which include one-fifth of those of all kinds, 160 barrels of apples, 34 barrels of flour, weighing more than three tons, are required every day. All kinds of fruits and berries, dried, canned and fresh, are pressed into service in the preparation of this popular article of food. Pies by the variety of their ingredients appeal to the palate, are inexpensive, and convenient as a dessert at the quick-lunch counter in the hotel and in the private home, and though indigestible to some are certainly beneficial to multitudes of people.

Feed me with food convenient for me. (Prov. 30 : 8.)

A Canine Chicken Thief

A man who gave his name as Sandy Farkerson has been robbing the hen roosts of the farmers near Montclair, N. J., by the wholesale. His plan was to visit the farmers and engage poultry for the holiday trade; upon the pretense of finding how the broods were kept he would visit the chicken houses, acquainting himself with their location and locks, and also showing a Scotch collie dog, who was a confederate with him in crime, where the fowls were kept. At night he would drive in his automobile, and send his dog into the chicken coops to steal the game. The dog had been taught the trick so well that he caught the birds by the neck, which prevented them squawking, but did not hold them tight enough to strangle them. The loss was so great that the whole neighborhood was stirred to hunt for the chicken thief. Miss Van Woert was aroused early one day by the barking of a black and tan dog. Getting up, she went to the window, and saw a small automobile standing in the road in front of the house. She also saw an animal of some sort darting back and forth between the auto and the yard. She called her father, who, using his night-glasses, saw that it was a trained collie dog stealing his chickens. He took his gun, but the click of the door-lock alarmed the man, and with one whistle from him the dog ran and leaped into the automobile and they drove away. A posse of citizens went to Montclair, but found that no man by the name given lived there. There is no end to the devices employed in stealing a neighbor's property. It was mean enough for the man to become a criminal. It was very mean to teach the dog his wicked tricks, when the instinct of the animal led him to guard the person and property of his master rather than secure for him that which did not belong to him. This man's sin, and that of multitudes who are guilty of crimes akin to it, are most positively condemned in the Old Testament and the New.

Do not steal. (Mark 10 : 19.)

The Funeral Boat of the Late Chinese Empress

The Dog and the Diamonds

Mrs. Isaac Mendelson, of upper New York, was frightened by the burglar scare in Harlem, and, putting her jewels in a chamois-skin bag, she hid them under her pillow at night. The other morning she shook the pillowcase and its precious contents out of a window. She did not miss her jewels until two hours afterward, when, discovering her mistake, she wept bitterly and telephoned the police. Three detectives and Captain Crawford undertook to solve the mystery. No trace of the bag could be found under the window or in the places in the house that were searched. The Skye terrier Speck seemed as much concerned as his mistress at the loss, and kept barking and making signs to her and the policemen, which they did not understand. At last the captain searched the pillowcases in vain, and throwing down the sheet he uncovered a three-inch hole in the mattress, and the yellow chamois-skin with its treasure concealed in it. When the policeman undertook to touch it Speck snarled and snapped, threatening to bite him. The dog had discovered the lost jewels, which were worth $1,000, under the window, and bringing them back he undertook to put them where they would be safe, having noticed, no doubt, that they had been hidden about the bed from night to night. If this little family pet, without any knowledge of right and wrong, should take such a deep interest in the affairs of his mistress and so labor to promote her welfare, how much more ought we to be concerned about the affairs of our heavenly Master, and labor to promote his kingdom! The question the child Jesus asked is one Christians should repeat:

Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business? (Luke 2 : 48.

Loyalty to Jesus

Professor Henry Van Dyke, of Princeton University, delivered an address recently on "The Church of To-day," at the closing service of the centennial celebration in the First Presbyterian Church of Germantown, Pa. In the address he referred to the "New Religion," suggested by President Emeritus Eliot of Harvard, eliminating Christ as the revealer of the Father, the divine Mediator and the Son of the living God. He characterized the "New Religion" proposed as the afterglow of the old religion which led his forefathers. Dr. Van Dyke said:

"Some men say, 'It is unreasonable that the church of to-day must be bound to a Lord of yesterday, one who has passed away.' Is He, then, dead and gone? Ask the man broken down by the weight of his sin, who, upon his knees in supplication, feels the need of divine forgiveness upon his brow. Ask the mother who hides her face upon the death of her little child, and says, 'Jesus, thy will be done,' and rises to face the duties of the day. Dead and gone? No, my brethren, he is here, and the church of to-day is built upon the assurance that he is living God. That is the message I would bring to-day to this church of my baptism, where my dear and honored father schooled me in the principles of the best and highest life. He gave me this message: 'Personal loyalty to Jesus Christ is the root and mainstay and heart of Christianity.' "

What a just criticism of the popular heresy Professor Van Dyke made, and how pathetic and inspiring was his tribute to his father's religion and his own personal loyalty to Jesus Christ, the living Lord and Saviour! Jesus in the past was the founder of Christianity and of the church. In the present he is its life and its love. In the future, he is to be its consummation and glory. Personal loyalty to the divine crucified and ever-living Redeemer is the root of genuine religious experience in the individual, and prosperity in the church.

Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever. Be not carried away with divers and strange doctrines. (Heb. 13 : 8, 9.)

A FAMOUS MISSIONARY GONE

REV. EGERTON RYERSON YOUNG, for many years a missionary among the Northern American Indians and widely known as traveler, lecturer and author, died at Bradford, Ontario, October 5, aged sixty-nine years.

The late missionary was one of the most interesting figures in the Methodist Church in Canada. His last days were passed at his home, "Algonquin Lodge," Bradford. About a year ago he went for a drive near his home with his brother, Mr. J. B. Young, of Vancouver, B. C., and the horse ran away. Mr. J. B. Young had his arm broken, but his brother was badly injured internally, and never fully recovered, but succumbed after a long struggle against ill-health.

Mr. Young was born at Crosby, Ontario, April 7, 1840, his father being a Methodist minister. He taught for a time in the Provincial Normal School at Toronto. He was ordained in 1867, and entered on the pastorate of the First Methodist Church, Hamilton.

He left the city to undertake missionary work among the Indians in the Northwest, and journeyed from Hamilton to Norway House in 1868, the trip occupying two months and nineteen days. He opened missions later at Nelson River and Beren's River, and his work met with great success. He had a great influence over the red men among whom he labored, and managed to keep them quiet during the stirring times of the Riel rebellion.

In 1888 he went to England, and remained there for nearly half a decade, telling of the great work of the missionaries in the West. Sir Charles Tupper is said to have stated that Mr. Young was Canada's best immigration agent. Mr. Young also lectured in many of the chief cities of the United States. He made an extensive tour of Australia.

Mr. Young published nearly a dozen books, the best known of which are The Apostle of the North, By Canoe and Dog Train, My Dogs in the Northland, Algonquin Indian Tales and Oowikapun. Rev. Egerton R. Young was a remarkable personality. His great strength had helped to face great hardships in his missionary work, and his talents as a speaker enabled him to describe most vividly the adventures which he encountered during those years.

The Late Missionary Egerton Young and His Famous Dog "Jack"

Our illustration shows the missionary with his great dog, "Jack," of which so much is said in his book, My Dogs in the Northland. "Jack" is considered one of the most intelligent of animals. He saved the lives of his master and party more than once. Jack, by the way, has a place also in literary controversy, for he is, on Mr. Jack London's own confession, the hero of his book, The Call of the Wild.

Mr. Young was one of the best known and best beloved Canadians, both at home and abroad. His books and sketches are in every land, and have been translated into French, German and Norwegian. Presidents Cleveland and Roosevelt both entertained him at the White House. Mrs. Cleveland especially enjoyed the accounts of his dogs, but Mrs. Roosevelt praised more his account of Indian legends.

In December, 1867, Rev. Mr. Young married Miss Elizabeth Bingham, of Bradford, who survives him. He also leaves four children, Rev. E. Ryerson Young, of Chatworth; Mrs. R. N. Helme, Lancaster, England; Mrs. A. B. FitzGerald, Hilton, N. J.; Mrs. Newton H. Brown and Mrs. W. E. Watson, both of Toronto.

Many readers of this journal will doubtless recall with pleasure the articles from Mr. Young's gifted pen that have appeared from time to time in these pages. Always interesting and helpful, his writings had the power to fascinate and to inspire men. We think of him as we think of Stanley in Africa or our own Sheldon Jackson in Alaska or Wilfred Grenfell in Labrador. In Canada especially his books will long remain a standard among the works of missionary pioneers.

THE PASSING OF SEATTLE FAIR

bluff covered with poppies. Pink and white, scarlet and yellow, a deep brown—the poppies waved in the sunlight. Not a dead leaf or flower among them; for every morning an army of gardeners was busy. Behind the poppies was a clump of darker shrubbery, then a gentle slope of emerald lawn. The color effect baffled description.

Over in another part of the grounds was a wonderful display of parterres of heliotrope and eupatorium.

The way the totems were effectively used pleased many visitors. There was one place where a railway had right-of-way across the exposition grounds. Another fair would have simply dug its avenue beneath the railway trestle, and stopped at that. But here the bridge was converted into a Japanese crossing, the beams of red sloping up at each end, the pillars down, at an outward angle. That was the beginning. It typified Japan—the East—the neighbor across the Pacific. Then the pillars were carved into totems, each totem worthy of close inspection.

The same idea was carried out with the lamp-posts. In place of simple arc lights along the avenue leading to the Pay Streak there were set totems—symbols of Alaska. No two totems were alike, save that each had its upper portion in the form of a bird or animal, of great beak or protruding lip, and from this chin there dropped a little incandescent bulb.

Uncle Sam gave object-lessons in what he is doing as a herder of reindeer. To most of us the reindeer is a creature of Lapland only, but now, in connection with the public school system in sections of Alaska, the government maintains reindeer herds. Natives are made apprentices to the teacher; as soon as they pass their examinations they become owners, or they may purchase if they will.

A hundred and seventy herds, ranging from six deer to 678, are already in existence in Alaska, and there are twenty-eight stations.

Interesting lessons were taught as to the famous gold of Alaska. Gold is gold, but up here one finds that there are differences in the metal. For example, the geological survey shows placer gold from the Gold Creek country. This is found in very thin pieces, but bright always. Then there is a gold-bearing concentrate from Nicolai Gulch—it is a brown, sparkling rock. Still again, there is gold from Bourbon Creek—it seems more like so much salt. Beach gold from Nome Beach, by way of comparison, looks like bright golden pepper. And the gold from the Solomon River is in very thin flakes.

"My lady" at the fair was apt to linger longest at the display of furs there. One might get a fine foxskin, six feet by eight, for $30. The historic old Hudson Bay Company showed a silver foxskin that $3,000 had been refused for. Ermine, boasting not alone the black lines on the white coat, but a green-yellow mottling, was on exhibition, and there were seal and bear skins without number.

Lovers of Indian decoration found much to interest them in a great quilt, worked by Alaska Indians. This was divided into squares of black cloth, each bordered by a row of beads, hand sewn thereon. Inside each several square was some design in small beadwork, no two designs alike. One might be of the American eagle, another a heart, another a field of stars or a bird. How long it took to make could only be roughly guessed.

Along with these things the fair brought its disillusionments. To one accustomed to reading of cold Alaska displays of wheat and oats and timothy, even barley, grown in the North, come as a surprise. Cauliflower and cabbage and turnips, raised in the Juneau country, far from these, were also exhibited.

Fruit, as a rule, is hard to make an interesting display of, but in the Agricultural Building one county, Benton, showed the apples for which it is famous, in ingenious wise. The county had its booths of quartered oak and glass. Then inside the pillars upholding the top of the counters, and inside these counters and in other glass pillars, reaching to the roof, the reddest apples were placed. A single bunch of grapes, weighing fully five pounds, taken from a three-year-old vine, caught many an eye.

Art in the Far North seems scarcely a developed field, and yet pictures shown would take prizes anywhere. One canvas, admired by many, portrayed two Alaskans, in their furs, coming upon a comrade lying dead in the snow. His dog-team, galloping off into distance, leaves one to guess, if he can, how death may have occurred.

Garments for the cowboys and the seamen are not apt to hold many passers, but one firm solved the problem by adding magnificent paintings, showing a cowboy turning a stampeding herd just as it is about to run down a herd-girl, and other scenes from Western life.

Music is farther behind than art is here, to judge from what is shown. They had on exhibition the first piano taken into Alaska's interior. It was made in Paris, to be taken to Sheep's Camp, and the date of its coming is only so recent as 1897.

Now that it is closed, one looks back half regretfully that he did not tarry longer and see more.

Chicago Crowds Hear Gipsy Smith

FROM the first public meeting, on the occasion of Gipsy Smith's latest visit to Chicago, up to the last service there was no abatement in the popular interest over the great English evangelist's powerful presentation of the Gospel. Since the great "watch night" gathering at the Coliseum, on New Year's Eve, when 12,000 were packed into the immense structure, there has been nothing like the Gipsy's meetings ever witnessed in Chicago, either as to attendance, deep religious fervor, or remarkable spiritual results. Hundreds made confession of saving faith at almost every meeting, and it is estimated that many thousands in all have been led into the light, directly and indirectly, through these services.

Our photograph on the opposite page, taken especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by G. R. Lawrence, shows a considerable section of the auditorium and galleries, but no camera can depict the entire scene within the vast Coliseum, which was crowded to the doors. The Gipsy's visit to Chicago, with its earnest appeals, its splendid choir and its rich harvest of souls, will long be remembered.

A PAGE FOR MARRIED FOLKS

John's Wife

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHEN John and Mary were married he was twenty-six and she was twenty-two. They were both, therefore, young people, with a fairly good prospect of happiness and usefulness for many years to come. Unfortunately for them both, Mary's theory of wifely duty was one too common with young wives, and, following it out day by day, she fostered in John a tendency to selfishness and a habit of neglecting her comfort in little things. Her one idea in the first twelvemonth, as it swiftly rolled by, was to set the table daintily for John, cook for John so admirably that he should never regret his mother's cooking, and send him forth to the world each morning brushed and starched, and groomed and shining. She waited on John hand and foot, saying, "Let me do this, dear, you are tired," performing for him with alacrity a number of trifling services that it gave her joy to render, and never showing by word or look that she was hurt when he neglected to pay little courtesies to her.

It is hardly surprising that John, although a good man, and at heart devoted to Mary, began presently to take every sacrifice on her part as a matter of course. After a while a child came into the home, bringing to father and mother a new link to bind them closer, and adding to their lives a greater delight than they had thought possible earthly life could hold. In the weeks before the baby's birth, and in the weeks that succeeded that event, Mary was unable to wait on John as she had hitherto done. Instead of understanding that her physical nature was undergoing a tremendous strain, instead of meeting the new need with a lover's enthusiasm, John at this period showed signs of impatience and weariness. He complained of a missing button, as if a ceiling had fallen; he left the table in disgust if the food were not to his liking; and, when the baby cried at night and kept her mother wakeful, John took his pillow and quilt into another room, remarking that he needed his sleep and if it were interrupted he would not be fit for business the next day. In short, Mary, by injudicious self-denial, had made of herself a slave rather than an equal and a comrade. She had spoiled a man who might have been a good husband had she remembered that in married life rights are reciprocal.

This is not a picture drawn from fancy. It is a leaf from the actual experience of many. If the young people who are about to marry this autumn would but take into consideration the fact that there are privileges alike for Mary and for John, rights and duties alike for both, and if, from the beginning, they would go forward with an ideal of justice as well as of generosity, the stability of their homes would rest on a firmer basis. In the partnership of marriage there should be no monopoly of service by the one or the other. Each should be faithful and loving, each slow to quarrel, and each quick to forgive if there be offense. No irritation or friction should be suffered to last over night. Let every day end in peace, but if peace is to be enduring let neither wife nor husband neglect civilities nor ignore the importance of trifles. In the home management it should be John's business to take the heavier end. He should carry the coal from the cellar to the kitchen, and assume whatever outside duties are beyond the strength of his wife. Mary should not be afraid that she will ruin her husband by showing him constant kindness, but she should permit him to wait upon her even as she waits upon him. There are wives and husbands who read this page, and, looking back upon their wedding day, must, if they are candid, acknowledge that they have not carried out their compact as they honestly intended to do when they vowed to be true to one another in sickness and in health, for poorer, for richer, for better, for worse, until the end of life. Retracing steps is not an easy task, but if there is reason to think it should be done these married folk, who in reality have a capital of love to draw upon still, should not defer the undertaking a single day.

Spoiled children are never favorites, but in their case mistakes may be corrected by parents and teachers. Spoiled husbands and spoiled wives, being grown up and having their habits to a certain degree fixed, are less easily brought back to their original ground of vantage; but if both are in earnest, or even if one sees the trouble clearly, the existent faults may be eradicated. At any rate, it is worth while to make a trial.

Remember that a habit of scolding and nagging does no good whatever, that a laugh is more potential than a burst of tears, that fretfulness and fault-finding nip love in the bud, and that the best panacea for anything wrong is to make it right at once. Never let the day go by without clearing up your differences and reaching a mutual understanding.

BABY IS AILING

Baby is ailing and what shall we do?
Almost too red is the rose on her cheek.
Sister is telling good Grandmother Prue
Baby has not been herself for a week.
Grandmother's magic will soon make her well;
"Cheer up, my darlings," she hastens to say;
"I'll make short work of this feverish spell.
Leave her to me and I'll drive it away."

After Seven Years

THE editor of this page receives numbers of confidential communications. So far as she can, she answers these to the best of her ability. Sometimes a letter arriving at her desk in the morning brings uplift and inspiration for the next twenty-four hours. Such a letter, written from Never-Mind-Where, breezy, bright and full of cheer, lies before her at this moment. Seven years ago the writer of the letter was married to the man of her choice. They have two little children. Husband and wife started first as schoolmates, next as sweethearts, and in due course as plighted lovers they were joined in matrimony. They have had their ups and downs, but have taken the road bravely. The husband, a professional man, had not wholly finished his studies on his marriage day, and in successive years has gone to his alma mater at intervals for a course of extension study. The two have been one in every thought and wish.

They have had numerous privations, have practised the sternest economy, and have learned how to make a little money go a long way. As a rule, they have been able to come out even at the year's end, but one year there was illness, that lasted over months when the wife was laid aside, and the bills for nursing and medical advice were heavy. Debt was incurred then, but it has been paid off little by little. These young people were brave enough to take their courage in both hands, accept their happiness in life's morning, and look forward to the future without being dismayed by the day of small things. They are beginning to see their reward. Times are easier, the income is growing larger and the children are thriving. The atmosphere of this home is one of plain living and high thinking. After seven years each is dearer to the other, each better understands the other, and each knows more about what life can be in a sweet, pure and wholesome environment than they could have done had they taken counsel of caution and dared the reefs and shoals of an indefinite engagement.

For the simple life, which we are learning to regard as the noblest life for Americans, a large amount of money is not an essential. There must be the shelter of a roof, fuel, food and raiment. There must be agreement as to what the home stands for. If practicable, there ought to be a margin over the annual expenditure, to cover those extraordinary things which, on occasion, befall us without our foreknowledge. One can scarcely dare to recommend marriage to young people who have neither the assurance of steady work nor a small amount saved for the rainy day. On the other hand, the experience of the little wife and mother, who writes after seven years of splendid struggle and conquest, that the cup of married happiness has, in her case and that of her husband, been daily filled to the brim should not be too readily discounted.

Set this in its star-like beauty in contrast with the stories of divorce, of conjugal shipwreck and of blighted homes, that too often disfigure the newspaper press. These stories, too, come often from homes not worth the name, where money has been abundant and luxury unstinted.

—L. A. A married woman should sign her name as follows: Mary Cooper. In brackets, if addressing a stranger, she should place at the lower left of her letter, or immediately below her signature, Mrs. John Cooper. Her legal signature is her own Christian and surname. If she wishes to use her husband's name in correspondence, she must write in the third person, thus, Mrs. John Cooper requests, etc.

THE HEART OF ELVIRA

By T. D. PENDLETON

THE New Preacher was up with the dawn. By ten o'clock he had worked two hours in his garden and was at his sermon, cudgeling his brain to meet the demands of his deacons who had called on him yesterday. Peter Foster had been spokesman:

"We don't mean no harm, young brother, but we'd like to have a sermon sometimes that don't sound so light and cheerful-like. That'll do all right for the saved; but the sinners have got to be thought of. There's a powerful lot of sinners in this town and they need medicine. Don't take exceptions to what we say; for I'm old enough to be yore grandpap. We know you're all right, and we like you, but you're young and you've got to learn to give it to the sinners."

The birds were nesting in the ragged shrubbery of the churchyard next door, and in Peter Foster's yard across the way a baby calf was kicking up its heels; the New Preacher was not making great progress in dealing with the sinners. It was hard to evolve harsh things in May. Perhaps, after the birds were abed he might be able to compound a bitter prescription for the sinners. He opened his engagement-book at the page marked "pastoral calls due," a list he had made at the prompting of his senior deacon. One of the entries was, "Sister Mary Ambler, invalid; needs frequent pastoral comfort." The eyes of the New Preacher rested a minute on the neat page; then he took up his hat and walked slowly through the courthouse square under the blossoming locusts, and entered the gate of the Ambler place.

It was evident that Sister Mary Ambler suffered no serious lack of material things. The paint on the big square house was fresh; the graveled walks neat. A small black maid with tight pigtails led the visitor to the pleasant sitting-room, where open windows let in the breath of lilac and locust. Sister Mary Ambler sat in a great rocking-chair, her dainty feet resting on a cushioned footstool. Sister Mary Ambler was pink and white, like Dresden china, and her voice was soprano and small.

"I am so glad you have come. Nobody needs comforting as I do, for I am crushed by the sorrow that has fallen on me. My daughter's trouble is infinitely harder on me than it is on her." Sister Mary Ambler put a filmy handkerchief to her childlike blue eyes before she could proceed: "Elvira was always unlucky, always getting into some trouble—from the day when she was three years old and fell into the rain-barrel in her best frock, on up to the day (it will be two years ago this coming August) when her lover was drowned before her eyes. It is hard to think that I, a bright, cheerful spirit by nature, must live out my days in a house of mourning. Nobody but a man of God who has made the sorrows of the human heart his chief study, can appreciate my feelings." Sister Ambler threw an appealing glance at the broad shoulders of the New Preacher, and went on:

"Of course, Elvira tries to make it up to me; but the sight of her in her black clothes is sometimes more than I can bear. How long has she been in mourning? Why, it will be two years this coming summer. Of course it would not be proper for me to let her take off mourning after such a sorrow, so I simply let my own feelings go. I must just bear it. Friends are thoughtful of me; they come in and tell me all about the socials and picnics while Elvira is at the graveyard tending John Blacklock's grave. Naturally Elvira with her broken heart does not care to hear of gaieties. Must you go? I do think it was so kind of you to come to see me so soon. Everybody is kind to me. It seems that the Lord lets people understand my sorrow."

As the New Preacher walked back to the parsonage a slim, black shadow ahead of him slipped through the glory of May sunshine that drenched the street and compelled from lilac and locust odors of poignant sweetness, while from behind bowed shutters Manie Lewis and a neighbor or two, foregathered to help in her "spring rush" of dressmaking, watched until the black gown and slatted bonnet disappeared around the corner of the old Morton garden.

"There goes Elvira Ambler to the graveyard," said one of the women. "I must run over and stay with her mother until she gets back."

"Elvira was beginnin' to act strange"

Meanwhile Elvira was approaching the schoolhouse. The children were coming out for afternoon recess, and the shrill sweetness of their voices hurt, like that of the lilac and locust. A little girl scanned the street and spoke in a whisper:

"Yonder comes broken-hearted Elvira Ambler! I'd give anything to see how she looks in the face; but ma says it ain't polite to look at a broken-hearted person. See! she's got her waterin' pot an' trowel; she's goin' to tend John Blacklock's grave."

All of this day Jimmy Massie had been a rebel. Now he ran across the street and suddenly sprawled in the path of the approaching black-clad figure, then sat up, one fat little hand rubbing a grimy knee while the other hid his wicked black eyes. Elvira Ambler bent down to him, and the group on the opposite side of the street, dumb with admiration of his daring, saw Jimmy look right into the black bonnet. When Elvira had passed on, they ran across to a strangely subdued Jimmy.

"Oh, Jimmy," breathed the litle girl, "how did she look?"

"Just like anybody else, 'ceptin' prettier. She's prettier'n anybody I ever saw."

The death of illusions is hard: to find that a broken-hearted person looked like anybody else was a blow—still, if Elvira was as pretty as Jimmy said, that was certainly some consolation. The little girl turned yearning eyes on the rebel.

"Jimmy, how does she look prettier than anybody else?"

Jimmy considered.

"Well, I've seen some mighty pretty girls in my time; but Elvira's got eyes all shiny-like—like lightnin'-bugs when they first light up at dark. I'm not afraid of her and I'm goin' to look at her every time I meet her."

Jimmy spoke in a tone of loud defiance; the little girl laid a warning hand on his arm: "Hush, Jimmy, the New Preacher's standing right behind you; he'll hear you!"

But the New Preacher had already heard—and seen. Jimmy was right. Elvira's face was young and tender, and her cheeks were sweet as clove pinks. The New Preacher had been born and brought up in the "penny-rile district"; he knew that custom was here a lord imperial as in a London drawing-room; but he could not accept the black figure in the midst of May, and bitterness gripped him. Elvira Ambler was not twenty, and yet life was done for her.

He sat far into the night in the bare front room of the parsonage. Framed by his open window was a silvered square of garden, and along the fence was a row of hollyhocks standing tall and straight, like maidens in pink sunbonnets; but one was in shadow and her bonnet was black.

Again with the dawn the New Preacher arose and sat in his bare study. But strangely now he had no trouble in admonishing the sinners, though the birds were still at their housekeeping in the shrubbery; the Sunday morning sermon so warmed Peter Foster's heart that he amen-ed too strenuously.

But after he had talked to the sinners, the New Preacher found a considerable number of unfilled hours on his hands. None of his flock was ill; nobody died; nor was he called to put the seal of the church on mating hearts. If any couple felt the ardor of the season it was crushed by hard necessity, for in this backwoods town slowly sleeping itself to extinction a young man barely got a living for himself. Into the empty hours gently entered the problem of Elvira Ambler. She passed the New Preacher's window daily on her way to her sad task at the cemetery, but the flight of the days did not accustom him to accept the black figure in the midst of the promise of May, and there grew in him a passionate pity for her and a desire to combat the custom that placed a widowed maiden outside the pale of human society. His duty lay plain before him—to persuade Elvira to a sane, healthy life in the companionship of her fellows.

At the end of a fortnight, it was with particular pleasure that he again took his way under the locusts in the courthouse square in response to an invitation to "take tea" with Sister Mary Ambler. But he and his dainty hostess ate the crisp brown waffles and broiled chicken alone.

Elvira had laid the table with the gilt-edged china and the thin, old Ambler forks and spoons, but as she was putting the finishing touch to a great bowl of purple and white lilacs, her mother had looked at her sharply and said:

"Elvira, your mourning is growing shabby. Shabby mourning does not show proper respect to the dead; and in your case it is downright indecent. After you help Mandy with the waffles, you had better go over to Manie Lewis's and try on your new dress. I'll put on white myself tonight—I'll never wear colors again. The mother of a daughter who's brought into the house such trouble as yours has got to consider the looks of things and sacrifice herself."

Elvira had a swift subliminal thought that white was more becoming to her mother's blonde prettiness than any color could be, as, a little later, that dainty woman stood in the door of the kitchen and whispered hurriedly:

"The New Preacher is coming up the walk, Elvira. I guess you've got enough waffles baked; so you can go on over to Manie's before dark."

Elvira obediently took up the slatted bonnet and went out at the side door, as her mother welcomed the guest at the front.

A "trying on" at Manie's was no little thing to be lightly and quickly disposed of. For an hour and a half the faded shutters of the dressmakers' front window were jealously closed, while Elvira waited for Manie to baste the waist where it needed "just a mite more takin' up," and she stood nearly as long again while a cruel Manie, her mouth full of pins, pinched and pulled in a valiant effort to make Elvira's new mourning gown fit properly, for Elvira had suddenly developed a critical tendency and demanded a taking-in here and a letting-out there.

When Elvira took her homeward way through the scented darkness, the big shoulders and yellow head of the New Preacher were framed by the open window of his study. As he sat there, he had a sense of having tilted with a mist and lost.

There are times when the strongest natures sadly acquiesce to the must-be; but one day when the slim, black figure passed the parsonage on its way to the sorrowful task at the cemetery, the New Preacher took up his hat and followed the narrow field-path that was beaten hard by grief-laden feet. When he reached the cemetery Elvira was already kneeling, busy with trowel and watering-pot. She responded to his greeting, but did not turn her face to him, and he walked on with the sense of bafflement coupled with a certain bitterness. The girl hugged her grief to her bosom and it would devour her. It was monstrous, this custom of the "pennyrile district" —it was equal to the suttee. There seemed no use combating it.

But as the end of the month approached and the days lengthened themselves to long-drawn-out sweetness, there were more unfilled hours, and the desire to be of help to broken-hearted Elvira Ambler grew to something like an obsession. It became a daily occurrence for the New Preacher's muscular arms to rest on the white paling at the daily grave-tending. Their talk was always of the flowers, and the girl worked while she talked; he never saw her face. As the lengthening days permitted more time for the tender rite, he began to linger until she had finished her task, taking his way onward as she gathered her tools. One day when the bedding of new plants had kept her later than usual and the evening star was just showing, like a beacon in a violet sea, and Elvira in her enthusiasm at the blossoming of a new and rare rose turned and looked full at him, he knew the truth.

On the following day, and the next one, and the day after that, no muscular arms rested on the white pale of the graveyard, but on Saturday the birds in the churchyard shrubbery were exulting in the appearance of the first pearl of promise in their nest, and the New Preacher watched them until the glory in the west was fading; then he took his way to the cemetery. No slender, black-clad figure knelt there by John Blacklock's grave; but the New Preacher stood there and looked at the mound that had buried his own hope of earthly joy. How she had loved that dead boy! Then rage gripped him, and he turned and set his feet in the field-path for a short cut to home.

In the fading light he did not see Elvira until he was close beside her, and she was yielding to such a burst of grief that she did not see him at all. Every quiver of her shoulders sounded a note of despair on his own heart-strings. His voice was gravely tender:

"Elvira, child, I cannot bear to see you like this. I know your heart is buried in the grave of your dear one, but——"

The girl suddenly turned herself so that she faced him squarely, and the movement threw the slatted bonnet to the ground. Her beauty thus revealed was greater than that of his imagining, but the tender eyes blazed in the dusk and her voice was bitter:

"That's it—that's what hurts: my 'dear one'! He was nothing to me. I am a lie, a living lie. John Blacklock and I were together in a canoe——he tried to kiss me, and I struck him; then he laughed and reached for a water-lily. He leaned over too far—— It was terrible—the shock of seeing him struggle for life when I was powerless to help. Afterwards I was ill; and when it was all over, people had made a heroine of me. It was not unpleasant, being a heroine,—at first (I was only sixteen) but when time taught me the truth, it was too late. I have tended the grave because there was nothing else left for me to do, but I hate it. I hate these ugly black clothes; but I must wear them. My life is done."

A sudden joy flamed in the eyes of the New Preacher as very gently he lifted to his own the sweetest face in the world.

"No, child, life is not done for you; it has just begun—for you and for me."

Manie Lewis nearly swallowed a pin as she saw through her shutter a strange and most improper thing—the New Preacher walking with broken-hearted Elvira Ambler, who held her bonnet swinging by the strings. With reckless disregard of the dishabille of a patron, Manie threw the shutter open wide and leaned out to look after the couple entering the courthouse square.

"Land sakes! Of all things! Elvira Ambler paradin' the streets with a young man, an' pore John Blacklock hardly cold in his grave!"

Suddenly remembrance of her own foresight fell like balm on her wounded spirit, and she snorted:

"I said Elvira was beginnin' to act strange. The very idea of a broken-hearted person thinkin' of fit—settin' up her opinion against me that's been makin' dresses for thirty years! I call her just shameful. Pore Mary Ambler! She'll take it hard, after the way she's sacrificed herself, too. We'll all just have to help her to bear this new trouble that's come on her."

They all did help Sister Mary Ambler bear her trouble; and on the day of the wedding, that dainty little woman sat in the midst of a sympathetic dozen as she put a dainty handkerchief to her eyes and said tearfully:

"Well, I can bear it. I've always been a martyr to Elvira. First, her being unlucky enough to lose her sweetheart and bringing sorrow on her mother; and then her being improper enough and selfish enough to turn her back on that sorrow in less than two years and leave her mother to bear it alone——"

Sister Mary Ambler lost herself in a maze of rhetoric and again had recourse to her handkerchief.

For even Elvira, in her new-found joy, had not been cruel enough to undeceive her mother concerning her long "mourning." It was enough that the New Preacher understood, and was satisfied that her heart was his and had never belonged to another.

"THE STRAWBERRY HANDKERCHIEF"

A DELIGHTFUL love story of old Colonial Days in New York. The opening chapter of this New and Fascinating Serial, by Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, author of Jan Vedder's Wife, The Bow of Orange Ribbon, etc., will appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 24. It is a charming romance of that most picturesque period of early American history. Jansen Van Vroom and his wife Katrina, with their sailor son and their pretty daughter, Virginia, and her rival suitors, Joris Artaveldt and Batavius De Vries, make a characteristic group, around which the main action of the story revolves.

Begins in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, November 24.

The highest medical authority on foods,

Sir James Crichton Browne, LL.D.—F.R.S.

of London,

gives the best reasons for eating more

Quaker Oats

In an article published in the Youth's Companion of September 23rd, 1909, Dr. Browne, the great medical authority on foods, says, about brain and muscle building—

"There is one kind of food that seems to me of marked value as a food to the brain and to the whole body throughout childhood and adolescence (youth), and that is oatmeal.

"Oats are the most nutritious of all the cereals, being richer in fats, organic phosphorus and lecithins."

He says oatmeal is gaining ground with the well-to-do of Great Britain. He speaks of it as the mainstay of the Scottish laborer's diet and says it produces a big-boned, well-developed, mentally energetic race.

His experiments prove that good oatmeal such as Quaker Oats not only furnishes the best food for the human being, but eating it strengthens and enlarges the thyroid gland—this gland is intimately connected with the nourishing processes of the body.

In conclusion he says—

"It seems probable therefore that the bulk and brawniness of the Northerners (meaning the Scotch) has been in some measure due to the stimulation of the thyroid gland by oatmeal porridge in childhood."

The Scotch eat Quaker Oats because it is the best of all oatmeals.

The Soil and the Seed*

"AMERICA is in danger," writes Dr. Jefferson. "The man is blind who doubts it. America may yet be lost. He who denies it has never put his ear to the ground and heard the roar of the subterranean fires which seethe under the thin crust of our civilization. As James Russell Lowell used to say, 'Democracy is only an experiment.' The Star-Spangled Banner may yet be torn to tatters by the fierce winds which blow from the deep caves of the human heart. To beat back the Saracen, to rescue America, that is the luminous goal of the crusade of our new century. Where shall we get the fire? Let us get it where God puts it—in the heart of the young. To set the youth of America marching against the Saracen, that is the supreme and crowning work of the American pulpit."

Thus let every member of this great Epworth army, full of the consecrated spirit of John Wesley, engage with heart and soul in the strenuous task of sowing the Gospel seed broadcast throughout our land—of saving America from the Saracen invaders and pillagers of infidelity, false religions, and atheism.

The home missionary is the light-bringer on the fringes of our civilization. He does not, perhaps, appeal to the imagination so strongly as the man who carries the Bible over-seas, and is framed in our mind amid palm trees and coral strands; but he is quite as important in God's sight, and to us personally the work he does is vastly more valuable. As Dr. Strong has shown us in Our Country, our very life as a nation may depend upon the work of our home missionaries.

And it must be done now. There is no time to lose. The soil is prepared. The seed is ready. All that we need is the men—and the money. The home missionary is the most poorly paid of all our workers. Mr. Puddefoot eloquently tells of the sacrifices he makes, the hardships which he endures, for the great cause. As Dr. Albert J. Lyman eloquently says, "There may be an Iliad of heroism behind a ten-dollar wage"; and this saying is illustrated, as nowhere else, on the home missionary field.

That is a significant historical fact, related in the accounts of Major-General Gookin, that John Eliot engaged in his great work of converting the Indian tribes of New England from the feeling that one principal end of those who settled that country was to communicate the Gospel to the natives; and that he would not be honest with the king who had granted to him and to his brethren their patent, or charter, unless he did all in his power to spread the Gospel among the red men.

The same burden is laid upon us. We are not fulfilling our duty to our nation unless we strive, in the remote and dusky portions of the land, to spread the saving light of our glorious religion. It is the time of seed-sowing. We are young and impressionable now. The hours are golden. Let us seize them.

There is no way so good for the kindling of enthusiasm upon this subject as the reading of the lives and adventures of the noble men who have given themselves to the cause.

The life of David Brainerd is full of dynamic force. He broke the way and set the pace, in the middle of the eighteenth century. Such results as followed his wonderful preaching among the Delawares have not been seen, say his biographers, since the apostolic days. As with Sheldon Jackson, one of our newest heroes in this field, he gave his life freely to the great cause, dying far too soon.

As the mighty Methodist denomination was founded largely to stop the strong tendency toward infidelity in England in 1729, so let this League, its youngest child, set its face like a flint against the godlessness on our borders. Go forth to preach Christ's Gospel. Give of your substance. Pray for the success of home missions.

* Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, November 14. TEXT: Mark 4:1-9, 14-20.

Beulah Land*

IT is said by many of the wise teachers of the present time that we should not allow ourselves to dwell too much upon the glories of heaven. Indeed, in some of the newer "religions," so-called, we are forbidden to think at all of any compensation beyond this life. We are simply to bear our part in the earthly struggle as unselfishly and nobly as we may, expecting no reward; and to leave all with God, when the end comes.

But the Scripture, as though our Lord meant us to think of heaven, abounds in delightful descriptions of the "rest that remaineth," and of the "many mansions" which have been prepared for those who love their Maker.

This idea should be emphasized. It is those who love, who "keep the faith," to whom the reward is promised. Dr. Lyman Abbott brings out this thought in his great sermon upon "The Christian Life." Paul had "finished his course"; henceforth there was laid up for him "a crown."

"He kept the faith, and, keeping it, he looked up for the coronation," says Dr. Abbott; "not a reward for righteousness, but a crown of righteousness. And to whom is this coronation promised? To men that have won the victory? No. To men that have fought the fight—denied only to the cowards and cravens that ran away. Though you lie wounded, though you have been beaten down again and again, if, still, you have at heart the purpose to fight the battle to the end, coronation shall be yours. Is it promised to those who have kept righteousness, to those who are pure and holy and sinless? No. To those who have kept the faith, to those who love righteousness and would give themselves to it, to those who long for the time when the kingdom of righteousness shall come in, cost what it may to us."

Thus it came to Christian and Hopeful, even at the very last led off though they were in by-paths, and buffeted by the waves of sin. Persevering to the end, they were then convoyed by the King's trumpeters, in white and shining raiment, into the gate of the Celestial City. And again it is Ignorance, poor Ignorance, who, like the man with one talent, suffers, and does not get in. We must not be ignorant. We must seek for the light of knowledge.

Among the many speculations in which men have indulged regarding "Beulah Land," a not uncommon one is that we shall not recognize our friends there. We are to associate with God and the angels. Since there is "no marriage nor giving in marriage," these theorists feel that husbands and wives will not recognize each other. By a natural corollary, children will therefore not know their parents, and so on.

This idea is revolting to most of us. The human heart cries out for its own, and hopes through everything that in the Beulah Land those "whom we have loved and lost awhile," shall greet us, strong, affectionate and beautiful, as in life.

* Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, November 14. TEXT: Isa. 62:3-5.

One of our correspondents has voiced this thought so adequately that her verses, "Recognition in Heaven," are given in full below:

Recognition in Heaven

SOME say that earthly loves must die
In heaven's distant land;
That friendships cease above the sky
Among the angel band.
But if that is a happy shore,
How can we know our own no more?

They say those never seen on earth
Shall be our heavenly friends;
That the love of the mother who gave us birth,
With the love of our children, ends
When we take our flight to the home above,
Which the poets call "the land of love."

They say the pastor who taught our feet
To walk in the shining way
Shall never in recognition greet
His flock in that perfect day.
But, ah! if that is a world of bliss,
Can we love there less than we do in this?

We are told that the martyr, the saint, the seer,
Who fought for the truth till death,
Shall know not those that they held dear
To their noble life's last breath.
Yet we read that on those streets of light
Falls never a tear nor gloom of night.

Faithful and true, as our loved ones be,
Can they fail us by and by?
Shall we pass them upon the Crystal Sea
With a dull, unseeing eye?
Those realms as strangers shall we share
With friends long gone before us there?

It cannot be. When life's long dreams
Are past, and we appear
In angel guise, celestial gleams
Will show us faces dear.
For God's best witness here is love;
Heaven-sent, it must persist above.

Called Higher

Edward Shaw, of Harrow, Ontario, Canada, passed recently to his eternal home. He was sixty-four years of age.

Miss Emma L. Johns, of Otterbourne, Md., passed to her eternal rest September 9, 1909. She had been a subscriber to this paper for many years. Her life was beautiful in its Christian example.

Mrs. Rev. J. Alber, of Story City, Ia., died February 6, 1909, at the age of forty-eight years. She was a faithful Bible reader and student. She had been a faithful reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for over twenty years.

George Harrison, of Drumbo, Ontario, Canada, was called away on December 30, 1908. He was eighty years of age. His wife preceded him in rest in April, 1907. For a great many years they were readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Died at her home at Roger, Ark., September 23, 1909, Mrs. Harriet L. Chadwick, wife of F. T. Chadwick, sixty-two years of age. She had long been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and a member of the Methodist Church for forty years.

Entered into her eternal home, some months ago, Mrs. Julia McDonald, of Confluence, Pa. She was in her eighty-fourth year, had been a church member for seventy-two years and member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family for about twenty-five years.

Mrs. Laura Rea, of Mesilla Park, N. M., entered into rest August 20, 1909. She was born in Canton, Pa., December 9, 1885. She had developed a fine Christian character. None knew her but to love her. She was a member of the Baptist Church since the age of 11 years.

Called higher from his home in Baltimore, Md., Dr. Edward P. Irons, aged eighty-four. Dr. Irons was a graduate of the University of Maryland, and entered the Officers' Hospital at Annapolis as surgeon. Later he took up civil practice. He was a member of many medical and philanthropic societies.

After an active and useful life, covering a period of over three-quarters of a century, Mrs. E. A. Fisher, of Los Angeles, Calif., went to her long rest on the afternoon of August 22, 1909. From childhood she had been a conscientious Christian. She prized the privilege of being numbered among THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family for years. Mrs. Fisher was born in Plainfield, Vt., December 15, 1832.

Deacon Francis Marion Wilson, of Murray, Ky., passed away last March. He was eighty years of age. He joined the Baptist Church in 1856, and remained a consistent and active member of that denomination until his death. He was a man of firm convictions, with high ideals of citizenship and of his religious duties as a Christian. He was the grandson of a Revolutionary soldier, who served under Washington.

Mrs. Lizzie Lucas Dillard died recently at Hidaway, Bosque Valley, Texas, in her sixty-ninth year. She was of a sweet Christian character and a woman of broad culture. For a quarter of a century she was a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and valued its consecrated character. She was the wife of Colonel Henry M. Dillard, of Meridian, Texas, and for thirty years dispensed her charities to all deserving objects.

Mrs. Sarah E. Tucker has been called to the better land from her home in Boston, Mass., at the age of eighty-three years. Till within a few years she was a resident of Bath, Me., and for more than fifty years was a member of the Elm Street Baptist Church. For more than thirty years she was a devoted reader of the Bible and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and watched each week for its coming with great eagerness.

This Beautiful Art Calendar Free

No other art calendar was ever so beautiful as the 1910 Armour calendar entitled "The Debutante."

In this calendar Penrhyn Stanlaws, C. Allan Gilbert and James Montgomery Flagg have done their very best color work.

You have never seen girls more attractive. The drawings are not mere ideals---they are true to life. Each page of the calendar looks like "an original."

The size of the calendar is 10 x 15 inches. There is no gaudy advertising to disfigure it.

How to Get One

Send the metal cap from a jar of Armour's Extract of Beef or paper certificate under the cap, with four cents to cover cost of mailing, to Armour & Co., Dept. D. N., Chicago. Or send us 25 cents in stamps. We'll send you a calendar by return mail.

Individual Picture Offer

We have a few of these drawings, size 10½x16½, printed on extra heavy paper, with calendar dates and all printing eliminated, which we will send prepaid for 25 cents each. Or we'll send the four separate drawings of this size and the calendar all for $1, express prepaid. These separate plates are ideal for framing.

Why This Offer is Made

We want you to know the hundred uses for a good extract of beef—not in the sick room, but in the kitchen.

Armour's Extract of Beef

We are willing to give you the calendar simply to get you to use one jar. For you'll never be without the extract once you know what it means.

Add it to soups and to gravies. See what your people say.

Impart it to "left-overs"—see how it freshens them. Make stews from the parts of meat that you now throw away. Note how good they are. But be sure you get Armour's.

Extracts costing a trifle less go but one-fourth as far. Just try one jar of Armour's. Learn at least some of its hundred uses.

Get one of these beautiful calendars with the top from your first jar.

A College With Ten Industries

IT was in September, 1847, that the first organized effort for the education of the colored race in this country was perfected in a school for negro youth, opened near Columbus, O., and called "Union Seminary." It was the first systematic plan of the race for its own education. It was the first special effort of any race for the mental uplift of the negro, and it anticipated by nearly fifty years the present idea of industrial training, being conducted on the manual labor plan. Here was the starting point of the Wilberforce University of to-day.

Main Building, Wilberforce University

Its teachers were negroes. Rev. John M. Brown, afterward Bishop Brown, was its first principal. Nine years later the white people, realizing the necessity of looking after the welfare of the 30,000 of the colored population of Ohio, took action through the M. E. Church in a similar direction. "Tawawa Springs" (Sweet Water), a beautiful summer resort in the southwestern part of Ohio, rich in mineral waters and historical interest, was purchased and a university for the colored race was organized and named "Wilberforce University," in honor of England's great abolitionist, William Wilberforce.

The school opened in October, 1856. Dr. Richard S. Rust left a prominent pastoral charge to become its first president. When the Civil War broke out the school was temporarily closed, and the trustees finally decided to sell the property. Since 1856 Bishop D. A. Payne had been its patron, and could not bear to see the usefulness of Wilberforce University at an end.

President W. S. Scarborough

But the State of Ohio desired the property, and Daniel A. Payne had not a dollar with which to purchase it for his people. Still the trustees decided to give the race the offer of the property for $10,000. Not twenty-four hours could be given for decision. "Without a ten-dollar bill at his command," not knowing where he could obtain any help, Bishop Payne "threw himself on the strong arm of the Lord," and with sublime faith in the possibilities of earnest endeavor for such a cause, solemnly pledged the A. M. E. Church to raise the required sum.

The crisis was passed and victory seemed secure when, within two years, $7,500 of the debt had been paid. On the day on which the immortal Lincoln was assassinated, April 14, 1865, incendiary hands laid the main building in ashes. However, faith and works again triumphed, and at last a finer brick building, at a cost of $40,000, became a reality—"Shorter Hall."

Then aid came from various quarters as the struggle of the school was seen and appreciated. Congress and the Freedman's Bureau made appropriations for its relief. Chief Justice Chase bequeathed it $10,000; then the Avery estate gave $10,000 more. Friends from all classes gave some assistance, and men and women of color laid down their offerings for its use in sums ranging from $5 up to $1,000. Growth and recognition increased till in 1887 the Legislature of Ohio had such confidence in its worth and importance as a necessary educational factor, with a large field of usefulness, that it made and still continues an annual appropriation for the support of a Normal and Industrial Department. Then the general government, under President Cleveland's administration, organized a Military Department, and a negro West Point graduate, Lieutenant John H. Alexander, was appointed to take charge. Wilberforce University is the only negro school recognized and maintained by the United States Government. Upon the death of Lieutenant Alexander,, another negro West Point graduate, Lieutenant Charles Young, was detailed to the school; and when the Spanish-American War broke out he went to the front, taking with him a large contingent of students, who fought with honor for the Flag in Cuba and the Philippines.

To-day the united schools in operation, aside from Military, are the College, the Theological Seminary and a Normal and Industrial Department, instructing the students in ten industries. Wilberforce University stands for the united education of head, heart and hand.

It has illustrated to the world what the race can do for itself. Dr. W. S. Scarborough, its president, is now endeavoring to expand its usefulness.

It cannot accommodate the numbers applying for admission, and more room must be provided. A $35,000 dormitory for girls, imperatively needed, is an assured fact if one-half the amount can be raised, as Mr. Andrew Carnegie has pledged one-half.

A number of $50 scholarships would greatly aid deserving students.

For all these the university makes a strong plea, begging humanitarians and philanthropists to give aid in the prosecution of its work. It bases its plea upon its past of struggle and achievement, its present equipment and ability, and its great future possibilities.

THE DIFFERENCE

Coffee Usually Means Sickness but Postum Always Means Health

Those who have never tried the experiment of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum in its place and in this way regainlng health and happiness can learn much from the experience of others who have made the trial.

One who knows says: "I drank coffee for breakfast every morning until I had terrible attacks of indigestion producing days of discomfort and nights of sleeplessness. I tried to give up the use of coffee entirely but found it hard to go from hot coffee to a glass of water. Then I tried Postum.

"It was good and the effect was so pleasant that I soon learned to love it, and have used it for several years. I improved immediately after I left off coffee and took on Postum and am now entirely cured of my indigestion and other troubles all of which were due to coffee. I am now well and contented and all because I changed from coffee to Postum.

"Postum is much easier to make right every time than coffee for it is so even and always reliable. We never use coffee now in our family. We use Postum and are always well."

"There's a reason" and it is proved by trial.

parts of India. The classes for boys and girls are of great importance. But I was interested most in the small industrial school, where a godly French carpenter is teaching the handful of boys. I asked whether they could not get more boys into the school. Mr. Cook said, "Certainly, but we have not support for more."

At Djemaa Sahridj, on the opposite side of the mountains of Kabylia, I was amazed by a work which I had not thought possible among Moslems. Here, for twenty years, two devoted, splendid English women have toiled, practically alone and unaided, always bitterly opposed, not only by Moslem priest but by Jesuit as well, and often in dire danger. But their heroic, persistent service has at last been rewarded, for converts have been won and a new era has dawned. I found a girls' boarding and industrial school of thirteen girls. Not many—but, as only a year before it had been absolutely impossible to get a solitary girl to remain in the mission over night, it is marvelous. On Sunday afternoon I addressed a company of some seventy women and girls, regular attendants, perhaps twenty-five being converts. Sunday morning there were seventy men and boys at the Sunday School, who come as regularly as do children in this country. An hour later was a meeting for Christian men, and about twenty were present; one, enlisted in a French regiment, having walked twenty-five miles to be there, starting at two in the morning and returning after the service. I photographed a half-dozen Kabyle Christian families, sturdy, keen, white and clean! I accompanied the missionary to several villages, where we were received kindly. Here, too, the whole situation has changed. The two devoted women told me that, had they had the superintendence, direction and backing of a strong, well-organized church, results would have been many fold what they are. I know nothing like it. Remember, it is direct Mohammedan work in a Moslem stronghold! And, taken with what else I saw and heard, I am convinced that the place to strike the Mohammedan line, and to strike it hard, is in Kabylia. This is what we purpose doing, as rapidly and as effectively as our resources will permit.

Dr. F. Rosch, graduate of Strasburg University, a genius at languages and an all-around fine young missionary, began studying Kabyle in March last. He has spent some time in Kabylia, and writes that he is now preaching in Kabyle, and wants the honor of opening the first American mission in the province. We intend that he shall have it. He will need a staff of a number of Kabyle workers. These we can draw from the converts already mentioned, and others, if support be forthcoming. I estimate that $150 a year will provide for each native station in connection with a missionary centre. Industrial work should be undertaken from the beginning, and we should be able to have more than the mere handful of boys now at El Maten. About $30 a year will support a boy.

For all this, and other developments, much travel and exploring must be done. Providence has prepared the way here also. There are railways to the mountains, and through the mountains and down into the desert the French have built magnificent highways. A Gospel wagon, designed for the country, would enable the superintendent and missionaries to rapidly and effectively reach places otherwise inaccessible. Such a car should, in the opinion of all familiar with the conditions, be one of the first things provided.

Men and women are ready to go to the field; Kabyle and some Arab converts are available as workers from the start; the way is open, the people listen to the Gospel, converts are being won—it is the clear day of providential opportunity. Given the means, the sympathy, the help of American Christendom, I confidently believe that not only in Kabylia, but all over North Africa, we should soon begin to see results hitherto unknown in Mohammedan work and to find the Gospel of Christ not only the power of God for the salvation of heathen and pagan, but for the Moslem as well. And, somehow, I feel confident that the help of American Christendom is going to be vouchsafed!

A Famous Actress Converted

ONE of the most famous German actresses, Frau Hedwig Wangel, has astonished her friends and the public by abandoning the stage for a religious life. Frau Wangel was attached to the Deutscher Theater, Berlin. Recently she attended a Salvation Army meeting in that city, and she states that she was influenced at that meeting to leave the stage forever.

"The honor and the soul of anybody who serves the cause of the theatre as heroically as I have done must go to eternal ruin," said Frau Wangel in a subsequent interview. "The theatre means ceasing to be. My decision was not taken suddenly. For two years I have been determined to leave the stage and the world, and devote myself entirely to religious work. I have forsaken all earthly things. Nothing any longer holds me back, and if I give up my family and my home to serve God it will not be hard to desert my art, in which I saw so much that was sinful. My decision to turn my back on all that is worldly and dedicate myself exclusively to Christ and brotherly love was hastened by the death and burial of Alexander Strakosch, the Berlin actor who died a fortnight ago while declaiming some lines from 'King Lear.' His death was untimely. His life to the last was rich in earthly joys. He had to leave the world unprepared."

One Way to Manage the Boy

LET me give you a page out of my boyhood life, which did more to straighten and keep me true than all the scowlings, scoldings and whippings I ever received. On one occasion I yielded to the temptation to gamble. It was the first time and, I thank God, the last; and as I was with a bad crowd I joined in the profanity which was current on that occasion. In the mercy of God, the knowledge of that day's escapade came to my mother; so, that night, after she had tucked me in bed, she sat down on the side of the bed and talked to me about both of these sins. Then she prayed to God to forgive them and me, told him how her hopes were centred in me, and plead that I should be made a pure, honest, true Christian boy. The next morning she compelled me to return my ill-gotten gains. I had a good many straightening-outs when I was a boy, but none of them did the business like bringing me face to face with Jesus, my Saviour. Parents, have you ever tried this plan, instead of punishing? S.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

A wonderful offer to every lover of music whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number, if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing, or Mandolin will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11 year old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

Established 1898—have thousands of pupils from seven years of age to seventy.

Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7, 225 Fifth Ave., New York City.

The Church in Paul's House*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

PAUL was on his way to Rome, having embarked in the ship Castor and Pollux at the island of Malta, as a distinguished prisoner. His course lay along the shores so recently devastated by earthquake, in the region about Messina, and through the Straits of Messina, along the southwestern shore of Italy, for the distance of one hundred and eighty miles, coming to Puteoli, on the Bay of Naples. Rome was one hundred and forty miles away, which distance was probably made on foot. In Paul's time Puteoli was a great city, "the Liverpool of Rome," as it has been called. As we saw it first, in 1880, it was a straggling, decayed town, with a row of remnants of piers, reaching out into the sea like old teeth. At Puteoli Paul met Christians, and was permitted to tarry with them seven days. It is true Paul was a prisoner, but he was a Roman prisoner, and a self-imposed prisoner, for he might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed to Cæsar, consequently he had some privileges that he would not have had if he had been a condemned Jewish prisoner.

It was the custom in those days to go out to meet princes, and to stand and wait for the incoming great one, and then to accompany him into Rome. Some Christians in Rome did just that for Paul; they went to where the road forked, forty-three miles from Rome, and there they stood, not knowing whether he would come by the left road or the right. Some one has said: "When Paul saw them he knew them. How is it that we know some men at once? How is it that we fall almost into common sympathy and fellowship, though we have never seen the man before? That is the mystery of friendship, that is the mystery of love." But Paul had known some of those Christians for thirteen years, and they had known him, through letters (Rom. 16:3-15). He had mentioned twenty-eight of them by name in his letters, and there were among them three of Paul's relatives. It is not to be supposed that these all came, but some of them undoubtedly did. Paul was far from being indifferent to those who thus came to meet him, for when he saw them "he thanked God and took courage." The approach to Rome was through the Appian Way, grand as Paul looked at it, but an avenue of dilapidated tombs as we passed through it in 1880, and again in 1904. Arriving in Rome, the prisoners were delivered to the captain of the guard, on the Palatine Hill, where was the house of Cæsar, at that time the monstrously wicked Nero. Paul was not kept in jail, but was permitted to hire a house, where he might dwell under guard of a soldier, to whom he was chained. We have twice visited that house. Two churches are built over it, one on top of the other, so that one must go down two stairways to reach it. The church is called Santa Maria in Via Lata. The house covers a space measuring not far from twenty-five or thirty feet square, and contains three rooms, two small and one large. The walls and floors are of a volcanic stone called "tufa." If ever there was "a church in thy house" in was Paul's prison house in Rome. He prepared for preaching the Gospel to the Jews after he had been there only three days. This he did by inviting the chief Jews to come to him, that he might set himself right with them, to whom he declared that he was a keeper, not a destroyer, of the Jewish law. His argument was that Christianity is the flower of Judaism.

A day was arranged for when all Jews, as many as could find entrance, were invited to come to Paul's prison-house. They came and stayed all day, and from morning until evening Paul expounded to them Christ in all the Scriptures, with the result that some believed and some disbelieved. Undoubtedly there was more than one such gathering in Paul's house, for we are told for two years he dwelt in that house, receiving all who came, none forbidding him. But the most remarkable result was "the saints in Cæsar's household." Who were they but the soldiers, who by turn acted as guard to Paul, Paul being chained to them? But the Gospel was not chained, and the situation gave Paul the opportunity to preach the Gospel to Roman soldiers. In the museum of the Royal College there is to be seen to-day a burlesque drawing of the crucifixion of a man with an ass-head, and under it in Latin the inscription: "Alexamenos worships his god." It was undoubtedly made by some soldier of the guard in derision of a Christian soldier, as it was found in the soldiers' quarters in Cæsar's palace during excavations made in 1861. It was then cut from the wall and taken to the museum.

The mind and the soul of Paul were unfettered in his prison-house, and even his bonds became opportunities for a larger life for himself and others. Like him was Samuel Rutherford, who, when in prison, used to date his letters "Christ's Palace, Aberdeen." He wrote to a friend: "The Lord is with me; I care not what man can do. I burden no man. I want nothing. No king is better provided than I am. Sweet, sweet and easy is the cross of my Lord. All men I look in the face, of whatsoever rank, nobles and poor. Acquaintances and strangers are friendly to me. My Well Beloved is kinder and more warm than ordinary, and cometh and visiteth my soul. My chains are overgilded with gold. No pen, no words, can express to you the loveliness of my lovely Lord Jesus."

It is easy enough to be pleasant
When life flows by like a song, [smile
But the man worth while is the man that will
When everything goes dead wrong:
For the test of the heart is trouble,
And it always comes with years, [earth
And the smile that comes with the praises of
Is the smile that shines through tears.

A New Kind of Sign

"You look better," Marjorie's mother commented, as the girl dropped into a chair and tossed off her hat.

"I feel better," Marjorie answered, quickly. "Dear Miss Alice! Did she ever fail anybody yet? She ought to have a sign over her door—I made it up as I came along:

"'Disappointments Gilded,
Silver Linings Discovered,
Old Blessings Revived,
Faith, Hope, Charity, free to all.
Miss Alice Kennedy, Brightside.'

"Isn't it a pity, mother, that people don't have signs on themselves or their houses? Think of the people who pass Miss Alice's house every day, and thus have the Gospel preached to them."

An old man was sitting on the roof of his house, gazing placidly across the rushing flood waters. "Washed all your fowls away?" asked the man in the boat. "Yes, but the ducks swam," smiled the old man. "Tore up the peach trees?" "Don't mind it much. They said the crop would be a failure." "But the flood, it is up to your windows." "Wal, them windows needed washing anyway."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Over in England an archdeacon, having reached the end of his life, had his home so constructed that he could spend his closing days in sunshine. In the morning they placed his chair so that he could turn his face toward the east and see the rising sun; at noontime they wheeled his chair into the south window, where he could behold the sun in his meridian; but in the evening hours they would place him in the west window, where he could behold the king of day sinking behind the distant hills.

So let me ask you in the morning of your life to keep your faces toward the east window, and at noontide live in the south window, but when evening time comes turn your face toward the west window, so that all your journey through you may live in the sunshine, and thus keep yourselves in the love of God.

John Bunyan in prison writing Pilgrim's Progress, and Martin Luther in prison translating the Bible into the German language are so familiar that we need only to refer to them to show that there were those who walked in the footsteps of Paul in making their prison-house a church.

Dr. Arnot, in commenting upon Christ's ministry on earth, said: "When an eclipse comes over the sun, a strange gloom is spread over all the heavens, and the sun seems to have been robbed of his glory; but when you have waited a while, and marked the changing phases of the phenomenon, you observe that the sun is shaking off the cold shadow of our satellite that seemed to cover his disc. The last remnant of the darkness disappears, and the light of day emerges in all his former glory. One can well imagine that, to angelic spirits, who imperfectly understand his attributes and plans, the incarnation of the Son might seem like a solar eclipse."

And so the imprisonment of Paul and Bunyan and Luther might seem like an eclipse, from the world side, but from the God-view the prison was a scene of glorious light.

Gospel Prison Work

In our day the Gospel is still preached in prisons; not by prisoners, but by those who go as prison workers. To them this story of Paul should be full of encouragement. The Roman soldiers whom Paul reached with the Gospel were not criminals, but, as idolaters, they were enemies of God, and they were brutalized by their profession, and so a hard class of persons to reach. Let prison workers take courage from the following story which was related at the Northfield meetings by the man himself: Billy Trout lived in New Mexico. A woman was murdered, and he was put into jail as the murderer, though he really was not guilty. As might be imagined, being held under false charges, he was very surly and hard to get along wth. One Sabbath the prison chaplain preached on the text, "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Billy Trout was present, and became very much interested, and after going to his cell he determined that he would seek the kingdom of God, that he would be a Christian. So complete was the change in his life that, instead of being considered a hard case, he became one of the "trusties." He was often sent to drive the horses to take visitors from the prison to the station. One day some visitors said, "You seem to be such a good man we feel like helping you to get your liberty." "No, indeed," Billy replied, "I will wait for God to give me my liberty." And he waited and waited years, and still was faithful. One day, when a new Governor was about to be inaugurated, some one told him it was the custom for a new Governor to release one prisoner, and it was suggested that he should ask for that pardon. "No, no," he replied; "don't say anything more about it. It would be wrong for me to think about it, unless God will 'add' it." A few days after, he was sitting thrumming on his guitar when there was a heavy step and a loud knock at the prison door. The Governor's orderly was announced. In a loud voice he called for "William Trout." Billy dropped his guitar as he rose up, and the orderly said, "Here is the Governor's pardon for you, William Trout." He could not utter a word, but in his loyal heart he said, "And God has added it." In telling this story at Northfield, he said: "Now I wear two pardons: one is God's pardon; I have that in my heart. The Governor's pardon I wear over my heart on the outside. If any one should arrest me, I would open my coat and take it out and show it; then I could not be arrested. But God's pardon is best of all—no one can ever take that away from me."

There is a man in Washington who came here to burglarize the city, but some prison workers got hold of him and helped him into the kingdom. Years of Christian life have so changed his face—made it so noble and pure—that he could not now be identified by his picture in the Rogues' Gallery. Take courage, prison workers! Psychologists tell us that it is impossible to change a brain specialized by habit. Very likely no human power could do it; but the Lord Jesus has power to unravel it, and so a new creature is made through his saving grace.

Those who have visited prisons have a vivid remembrance of the oppressive atmosphere—so lonesome, so forbidding, such foul odors. "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here." How different the atmosphere of Paul's prison! Paul was more like a chaplain than a prisoner. When he was not preaching the Gospel to the soldier guard he was writing letters to Christians in distant cities. He was not lonely, because hosts of friends flocked to visit him—some of them he mentions by name in the letters which he wrote: Timothy, Epaphras, Tychicus, Aristarchus, Mark, the author of the Gospel; Justus; Luke, the writer of the Gospel and author of the Acts; Epaphroditus, etc. Christian fellowship was sweet to Paul or he would not have "thanked God" for it.

Distress in Finland

TWO ladies, working in the service of the Finnish Mission Association in Suomussalim, Finland, have written to friends in America about the distress prevailing there. At a place named Puspajarui they found two huts, where the baking flour had to be mixed with bark. A clean piece of wholesome bread could not be found in the neighborhood. The people were pale and sick from lack of food. In another place, Hallala, they had bread made from bark and straw, and no flour at all. Their flour had not lasted longer than January. Even bark was not always easy to get, and the people then make cakes from straw and hot water. The mother in one family had gone to Uleaborg to beg, and a little milk from the cows kept the children in life meanwhile. There were six children, all clad only in shirts. In Torawaara also the people had only straw to eat. A few had a little flour, which was used for cooking a kind of pap. Bread was made only one time during the year. Five children in one hut were naked. In Lehtovaara conditions were the same. Bears did much damage in these sections. In one place, the bears killed three cows and injured two others and several sheep.

Astronomical Queries

By PROF. S. P. LELAND, Seabrecze, Fla.

C. S. W., Aurora, Ind. Why does the North Pole of the earth appear always to point to the North Star, and the South Pole to the same place among the stars of the southern constellations? Why is not the real change of the earth around its orbit apparent and discernible?

The earth is not transported through space with a fixed axis of horizontal or upright rotation, but is inclined at a certain angle, and this inclination remains the same during the whole year. This axis of rotation is always parallel to itself during its entire annual revolution, and its northern extremity is constantly directed to a fixed point in the sky, in the direction of the polar star. It is immaterial in what part of its orbit the earth may be. This inclination is the same everywhere. This axis, however, is very slowly changing. The polar star is receding from the pole, and in twelve thousand years the brilliant star Vega, or Alpha Lyrae, will be the pole star, as it was fourteen thousand years ago. This motion of the earth is known as "the precession of the equinoxes." The earth will perform a complete revolution in 258 centuries. It is easily seen that the motion is so slow that it cannot be marked in the period of human life, much less in a single revolution around the sun.

J. H. K., Fayetteville, Ark. Some papers are telling about a star that is visible now, calling it the "Star of Bethlehem." About twenty or twenty-five years ago there was a star that they called the "Star of Bethlehem," and again about fifteen or sixteen years ago there was a stir about this star being visible, and each time it was claimed it would not be seen again for one hundred years, and some said five hundred years. The papers are saying that this star we see now is to be seen for a short time and then it will not be visible for centuries again. Can you tell me which of the three dates mentioned is correct, or if either of them was the real "Star of Bethlehem"?

The stars inquired about have been mentioned by very ancient historians, but the first one minutely described was that mentioned by Tycho Brahe, in 1572. This was so bright that it was seen by the unaided eyes in the light of day. In 1604 one was recorded by Kepler and Galileo. This one remained visible for nearly eighteen months. Astronomers have recorded more than two dozen different stars which have blossomed out in the sky with a sudden increase of light and then again become invisible. Some of the recent recorded appearances have been those of 1864, 1872, 1885, 1892, 1901, and one is now visible. Spectrum analysis has revealed that, in some instances at least, this brightness is caused by the burning of incandescent hydrogen. This quite frequently takes place, in a similar way, in our own solar photosphere. A peculiarity of these stars is that they do not blossom out at random in different parts of the sky, but are confined generally to the region of the "Milky Way." The appearance of these stars is not periodic, but they have all degrees of irregularity. There is a family of suns, known as periodic stars. They appear and disappear with regularity. But the stars about which inquiry is made do not belong to that family. The time was, in the infancy of science, when the appearance of one of these irregular stars was believed to augur all sorts of calamities, from wars and revolutions to the awfulness of the Judgment Day. But science has put to rest such fears. These ephemeral blazes mean nothing to us except the facts of the existence and motions of the stars and the complex universe. They are so far outside of our own system that we can receive no perceptible influence from them. In the present state of astronomical knowledge it is impossible to forctell their coming or their going.

A. M. P., Spencer, Ia. Who are good authorities on astronomy? Mention a few standard books on astronomy.

The literature of astronomy is so voluminous that it is difficult to name any book that even attempts to cover the whole science. There are books on special subjects, such as the sun, the planets, on eclipses, conjunctions, light, spectrums, and a half hundred other subjects, dealing with each thoroughly. Flammarion's Popular Astronomy and Proctor's More Worlds Than One, though a little old, are good for general reading. The tendency of scientists is to specialize. There are works of merit on every branch of the science, some of them covering quite wide fields. Any general book catalogue will put you in touch with these. Young's Popular Astronomy is excellent, but a goodly number of books on special departments will be necessary for anything like a thorough knowledge of the science.

D. M. S., Guymon, Okla. When may we expect to see the Halley comet with the naked eye, and at what hour and in what part of the heavens?

Halley's comet is now visible by the aid of large telescopes, and has been photographed at several observatories. It will be visible to unaided eyes about the middle of April, and will pass between our planet and the sun about June 10, 1910.

What Will You Give To Be Well
To Have Good Figure, Vibrant Health, Rested Nerves?

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 43,000 women in the past seven years. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles and to my 12 years' personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty. If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work.

I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness, which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the vivacity which makes you

A Rested Mother
A Sweeter Sweetheart

I teach you to stand and to walk in an attitude which bespeaks culture and refinement. A good figure gracefully carried means more than a pretty face. Nature's rosy cheeks are more beautiful than paint or powder.

Too Fleshy? You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced over 25,000 women. One pupil writes me:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I have reduced those hips and I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now. When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh, dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Arise to Your Best

In the privacy of your own room, I strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lungs and heart, and start your blood to circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breath so that the blood is fully purified. I help you to arise to your best.

To Thin? I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil was who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms. My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

The day for drugging the system has passed. The strength of vital organs gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as

Constipation Rheumatism Irritability Nervousness
Torpid Liver Weaknesses Weak Nerve Sleeplessness
Indigestion Dullness Catarrh

This is accomplished by strengthening whatever organs or nerves are weak. I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in your own home.

If you will tell me your faults in health or figure, I will cheerfully tell you about my work and if I cannot help your particular case, I will tell you so. I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands. Send 10 cents for instructive booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly.

The "Lifeline" Church

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have all probably sung with pleasure that inspiring hymn "Throw Out the Lifeline," one of the most universally known songs of hope and faith which has ever been written. The hymn was greatly admired by Mr. Sankey, and he sang it on his evangelistic tours in Great Britain and Palestine. In fact, the great Gospel singer often referred to it as his favorite song. Some time ago there was printed in this paper an account of the efforts being made by its author, Rev. E. S. Ufford, to build a "Lifeline Church" at Rockland, Me. The efforts of the author-pastor have been crowned with success, and Galilee Chapel, as it is called, is throwing out "the lifeline" and drawing men into its portals to find redemption and peace.

The church was built largely from funds secured by the pastor's own efforts, and Mr. Ufford himself worked early and late with the masons and builders. A neat little parsonage adjoins the structure, and though small it is most artistic, and contains many features which will make it a place of interest to visitors. There is a tower at one side, surmounted by a cross, and on the cross is a ship's anchor, which reminds one of the sailors' hymn and the firm anchor of the Christian faith in time of stress and storm.

In the church is a beautiful painting of Christ walking on the sea. In the picture Christ is rescuing the apostle Peter from the waves. At one side is another person grasping a piece of wreckage, and looking up toward a rift in the clouds from which a lifeline is being lowered. "This," said Mr. Ufford, in an interview, "is to represent the risen Christ, who still saves." The lesson is further emphasized by appropriate Scriptural texts in illuminated colors.

There are eight beautiful memorial windows to famous hymn-writers. Underneath each window is the title of the hymn by which the writers are best known.

Rev. Mr. Ufford is now gathering a congregation about him, for the church came first, a reversal of the usual order of things. It will probably be but a short time before quite a large number will gather every Sunday in the cheerful temple, and form themselves into an active church body, under the leadership of the consecrated pastor. Mr. Ufford first entered Y. M. C. A. work. Then he studied at Bates Theological School, and was ordained to the ministry in 1879. He has held several important pastorates, and made a missionary tour of over a year's duration in the Far East. He is a Baptist, but the church will be conducted on a broad basis of Christian fellowship. It will be a "people's church," and all will be welcome to worship there.

SAFE AT HOME

WE grieve for our friends departed
That their walk on earth is o'er;
We miss the daily presence
That gladdens our heart no more.

But while we sorrow and suffer,
And grope through a darkened night,
They are safe in the Land of Promise,
The land of God's love and light.

No more for them is the heart-ache,
They have changed the tear for a smile,
All the sorrow and pain are over
That burdened them many a mile.

Can we grieve when their cares are lifted,
Grieve when their burdens are gone,
Grieve when their hearts are lightened,
When they sing in the golden dawn?

Safe in that beautiful country,
Safe in the light of His love,
Safe in the beauties eternal,
Safe in that pure home above.

God grant us the same happy homeland,
Where we change the cross for the crown,
Grant that we meet in His presence
When our earthly robes are laid down.

Clintondale, N. Y. CARABEL WARDELL.

Why Irrigation Bonds Are So Popular

The most popular bonds that we handle now are Irrigation Bonds. They have displaced, with a large share of our customers, Municipal, Corporation and Public Utility bonds, which pay a lower rate.

When rightly conducted, Irrigation projects now involve no uncertainty. The Government itself is spending tens of millions of dollars in reclaiming this arid land.

The demand for irrigated land exceeds the supply, because of its enormous fertility. And because an unfailing water supply, under constant control, insures one against crop failures.

The most productive and costly farm lands in America are now in the irrigated sections.

Carefully Guarded

The projects which we finance are carefully guarded. Our own engineers and attorneys pass on every feature. An officer of our Company, residing in the West, keeps constantly in touch with every project until the whole work is completed.

We have our pick of these projects, because we are known as the leading dealers in Irrigation bonds. The projects we finance are always well located.

In the past 15 years we have sold 71 separate issues of Reclamation bonds—Drainage and Irrigation—without a dollar of loss to any investor.

The Security

Irrigation bonds are secured by farm liens, given by individual owners in payment for water rights.

These liens are conservative—more so than the usual farm mortgage. They are often for less than one-fourth the land's value.

The first crop from the land is frequently sufficient to pay the whole lien—often by several times over.

In addition, the bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns—the property which the proceeds of the bonds help to build.

Some of these bonds are municipal obligations, issued, like School bonds, by organized districts. Such bonds are tax liens on all the real property in the district.

Some of these bonds are issued subject to the provisions of the Federal law known as the "Carey Act."

The security in all our projects is ideal and ample. It is hard to conceive of anything better.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent. interest—a higher rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

The reason is this: Irrigation projects are profitable. There are few undertakings where such amounts of money can be used to equal advantage.

The demand for irrigated land is now overwhelming. And there is great demand for money that will help to supply it. So the bonds pay this liberal rate.

$100—$500—$1,000

Irrigation bonds are issued in series, usually payable all the way from two to twelve years. One may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

They are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

Ask for Our Book

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds, which every investor, small and large, should read. It is based on our intimate knowledge of the facts, gained by 15 years of experience.

Please send this coupon to-day for it. It will enable you to judge if Irrigation bonds form the sort of investment you seek. (4)

Teaching Without Books

AN interesting article in the New York Sun describes the objective method of teaching English, which is now used in some of the public schools where there are many alien pupils. In one class the children spoke either Yiddish, German or Italian, and less than fifty per cent. understood a word of English. Three weeks effected a transformation. One teacher thus explains the method:

"The children I will call on to answer this question," she said, "are those who knew no English at all at the beginning of the term. Most of the words they will have had in previous lessons, but I will use one or two new words."

The teacher wrote "stand" on the blackboard. "Velta," she asked, "what word is this?" "San," replied a girl of ten, with thick utterance.

"Stand," said the teacher very distinctly. "Sand," said Velta.

"No, not 'sand,' 'stand.'" "Stand,' the child repeated.

"Well done," said the teacher, beaming approval.

"I stand" was written on the board, and every child in the room went through the motion, just as her teacher had done at the start. "Walk" was written on the board, and "I walk" was acted. A new word was "shut." They knew what "close the door" meant, but "shut" was a poser at first. In a few minutes one after another, in turn, got up and acted this sentence written on the board, each repeating the words distinctly: "I rise from my seat, I stand, I walk to the window, I open the window, I shut the window, I walk to my seat, I sit."

Afterward one after another pointed out the different words asked for on the blackboard. The pronoun "you" was substituted and the acting was changed a little. Only names of familiar animals, foods, plants and articles of clothing are used in these lessons, and once pupils get their tongue successfully around English consonants and vowels the rest is easy. Learning objectively the meaning of a word it is seldom forgotten.

Among the Workers

—AT THE RECENT annual missionary meeting of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, in New York City, the sum of $64,000 was contributed in cash and pledges, for the promotion of work in the foreign field.

—MISSIONARY W. H. SHEPPARD, who was lately placed on trial at Leopoldville, Congo Independent State, West Africa, for alleged libel against the Congo government, has been acquitted, the company failing to show that it had been damaged by his representations.

—A REMARKABLE RELIGIOUS service was held in Dayton, O., on a recent Sunday evening, when the Rev. George Walton King preached in the Park Presbyterian Church to 3,600 people and distributed 1,000 vest-pocket copies of the "Life Directory," otherwise the Gospel of John, as a gift from the minister.

—A NOVEL AND PLEASING arrangement of Sunday School rooms is that in the new and beautiful M. E. Church at Prospect Avenue, New York City, which has just been dedicated. The Bible School rooms are in a semi-circular row, in two tiers, one above the other, producing a fine effect, besides affording ample accommodation for a large number of classes.

—THE EVANGELISTIC COMMITTEE of New York during the past summer had work in 57 centres, 10 tents, 24 shops, 20 open-air and 3 halls, also in hospitals and prisons. The meetings were conducted in seven languages—English, Spanish, Italian, Bohemian-Slovak, Hungarian, Polish and Finnish-Swedish. There was a total of 1,907 meetings held, at which there was an attendance of 287,260.

—TWENTY-EIGHT BROOKLYN churches have united in a general revival movement this fall. They include Methodist, Congregational, Presbyterian and Baptist churches. Several Episcopal churches are heartily co-operating. Preparatory work is now under way, and the territory has been canvassed thoroughly. Beginning October 31 to November 14, the real campaign will be conducted with intense activity, and meetings will be held almost daily.

—THE AMERICAN SEAMEN'S Friend Society's new institute, 507 West Street, New York, opened about a year ago, has proven so attractive to the seamen on the North River that room to accommodate the men is a pressing problem. Nearly 40,000 visits are made to the institute monthly. The society has set apart a chaplain to care for the spiritual welfare of the thousands of seamen in the Chelsea district. Rev. Edward M. Deems, late of Hornell, N. Y., a son of the late Dr. Deems, pastor of the Church of the Strangers, has been appointed to the work.

Paul a Prisoner in Rome

By Mrs. M. Baxter

AFTER a sojourn of three months in Melita, the whole company of the shipwrecked vessel which had Paul on board embarked in a ship of Alexandria. Their first landing-place was Syracuse, in Sicily. After three days' stay they crossed to the coast of Italy, where they first touched at Rhegium. After one day's stay they set sail, under a south wind, for Puteoli, the modern Pozzuoli. And here, for the first time since they left Sidon, they "found brethren, and were desired to tarry with them seven days."

From thence they came to Rome. "And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us as far as Appii Forum, and the Three Taverns." It is somewhat unusual that a prisoner on his way to his trial should be met by an ovation of friends, but so it was.

Paul was still a prisoner, although treated with courtesy and consideration. On the arrival of the party at Rome a distinction was made between him and all the other prisoners. While they were delivered to the captain of the guard, he was permitted to dwell by himself, with a soldier that kept him. The man of God saw the Lord's hand in this, and, making use of the liberty thus granted him, he lost no time in calling together the chief of the Jews that he might make known to them that theme of apostolic times, "Jesus and the resurrection." In all his journeys Paul had first sought out the Jews, and only when Jesus was rejected by them had he turned to the Gentiles. For more than two years Paul had known that God would send him to this very company of men who were now gathered before him. This was, perhaps, the first time that the claims of Jesus of Nazareth were represented to them by a living witness who was, when he spoke with them, suffering persecution for his sake.

This first meeting of the Jews in Paul's house resulted in the appointment of a day when they should meet at his lodging, and there together search the Scriptures and discuss "The Hope of Israel." When the day arrived, the meeting was a very large one. It was an all-day meeting, of absorbing interest. All Paul's arguments were drawn from the Written Word. Scripture sustained Scripture, and then the personal testimony followed. Much went on in that house of which there is no record: hearts were melted, consciences were touched, reason was convinced. But then the cost! Should these proud, rich Jews take a position which would make them the scorn of their nation, and put them on a level with the despised Gentiles? Should they risk wealth, position, ease, comfort, everything but their own souls? Could this Jesus fill so great a void? The shining faces of Paul and Luke and Aristarchus were the sufficient answer: "Yes, and fully." What was the result? "Some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not." This is always the way, and the will of man must decide. No man can save himself, or contribute in the smallest degree to his own soul's salvation. But at every step of the way—first for pardon and separation from the world, then for sanctification, for the anointing of the Spirit for service, for healing of the body, for deliverance from temptation—there always comes the point when Jesus says, "Will you let me save you? Will you yield yourself up absolutely and trust me?" The "I will" of each must answer. They "agreed not among themselves." In that day, as in this, men tried to find out by reason the truth of God. "The world by wisdom knew not God." Revelation is above reason. Reason was created only as the servant, and not the master, of revelation. If men would only learn that spiritual things are "spiritually discerned," they would long to be taught, and would be in a position to learn.

THE WAY OUT

Change of Food Brought Success and Happiness

An ambitious but delicate girl, after failing to go through school on account of nervousness and hysteria, found in Grape-Nuts the only thing that seemed to build her up and furnish her the peace of health.

"From infancy," she says, "I have not been strong. Being ambitious to learn at any cost I finally got to the High School but soon had to abandon my studies on account of nervous prostration and hysteria.

"My food did not agree with me, I grew thin and despondent. I could not enjoy the simplest social affair for I suffered constantly from nervousness in spite of all sorts of medicines.

"This wretched condition continued until I was twenty-five, when I became interested in the letters of those who had cases like mine and who were being cured by eating Grape-Nuts.

"I had little faith, but procured a box and after the first dish I experienced a peculiar satisfied feeling that I had never gained from any ordinary food. I slept and rested better that night and in a few days began to grow stronger.

"I had new feeling of peace and restfulness. In a few weeks, to my great joy, the headaches and nervousness left me and life became bright and hopeful. I resumed my studies and later taught ten months with ease—of course using Grape-Nuts every day. It is now four years since I began to use Grape-Nuts, I am the mistress of a happy home and the old weakness has never returned."

GRAFONOLA

The One Incomparable Musical Instrument

THE GRAFONOLA marks an epoch in the evolution of the perfect musical instrument. By its use of Double-Disc talking-machine records, it is in reality a Graphophone—but a Graphophone of marvelous richness of tone, and entirely self-contained—without the horn or any other recognizable talking-machine feature. Its construction embodies entirely unique principles of sound-reproduction and of tone-projection.

The added $25, in the $225 instrument, secures you a Regina equipment, including twelve Regina tune discs, that in a smaller casing is being placed in thousands of drawing-rooms at $100. The Regina Music-Box has its hosts of friends among lovers of music. Its combination with the Grafonola brings to the home everything that can be sung or spoken or played.

There are "concealed-horn" talking-machines on the market already. If you will make just one comparison you will own a Grafonola. You can make this comparison by stepping into any store where Columbia records are carried in stock—or you can do it fairly well by mail. We have an advance catalog ready for you. A "Freight Train" in Rural Japan

An Awaji Fish Peddler

Setting Out on an Evangelistic Tour

IN THE HEART OF "OLD JAPAN"

By MATTHIAS KLEIN, Sumoto, Japan

IT is well-nigh a year since I wrote my last letter to your readers. Just before New Year's we were transferred from Akashi to this island. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is one of the few publications through which we are kept from feeling so keenly our isolation, as the only foreigners in the place. This is indeed an island, but not to be despised for that reason. One might as well speak lightly of Japan's entire empire or the British Isles.

Curiously enough, however, some people, uninformed as to actual conditions, might consider this mission field a rather insignificant one. Probably just because it does not sound big, like cities such as Tokyo or Osaka. Not long ago a divine paid a visit to Awaji for the first time during his long missionary career in this country. He was struck with amazement when gazing upon Sumoto, the capital of Awaji, and its surrounding beautiful scenery of ocean, mountains and valleys, from a near-by hill, whose summit is crowned with massive bulwarks, the remains of an ancient castle. I led this clergyman down the busy, though narrow, streets, where he saw a veritable bee-hive of industry from one end of town to the other. Moreover, he met a number of our Christians, which afforded him more pleasure than anything else.

This island, with its fertile valleys, dammed off at their lower ends from the sea, and bright with growing grain; the peaceful villages; the pine-clad hills, now and then dotted with dark green orange groves; the sampans, with their brown, half-clad owners, gracefully sailing out to the fishing grounds—this and more make a beautiful picture indeed. Every bay, yea, even the smallest headland, is steeped in poetry and history.

The climate is excellent; though we hardly ever see ice in the winter, yet with the ocean all around us, invigorating breezes are often ours, even in the hottest summer. The weather varies: sometimes the breath of spring is in the air, and in the glow of sunshine all nature is arrayed in rich colors. Again, rain pours down in torrents for weeks, while winds from an easterly direction, laden with the damp, salty odor of the sea, beat about our dwelling.

Awaji is but a few miles from the mainland, and not much farther from Kobe, the seaport. There are no railroads here as yet, and they hardly seem necessary, since mail steamers glide about the island every few hours in the day, and the mail to and from the interior and smaller villages is speedily dispatched by the light-footed mail-carriers, who trot the entire distance. Besides steamers for traveling and traffic, sampans and schooners are as plentiful in every little harbor as jinrikishas are in Kobe. In the interior, big, sturdy oxen, hitched to two-wheeled carts—also frequently drawn by men—answer every purpose. Awaji, barely 100 miles in circumference, is the most thickly peopled section in Japan. The population is about 250,000, we being the only foreigners. Sumoto, where we reside, is renowned for its artistic and costly pottery products; here are also two large spinning mills, with their thousands of employees, and also many minor manufacturing industries. Here are also the banks, newspaper, telephones and telegraphs. Those attending the common and higher schools form a large percentage of the mission's working material.

The Awaji Island Farmer Going to Market

By the way, the people of a town not many miles from here think it a special honor that they are privileged to supply the table of their revered Emperor with rice from their neighboring fields. But the people depend more on the fishing industry than even rice growing. On a fair day, the steamer may cut through a fleet of fishing sampans, as many as two hundred, congregated on a space covering not more than twenty acres. Some of these fishermen spear octopus with a three-pronged instrument. They use a square box with a glass bottom, which enables them to see the haunts of Mr. Octopus at a good depth. Talk about the abundance of life on the island! There seems to be a great deal more in the sea about it: fish and creeping things almost beyond number or knowledge. There is also a great variety of sea birds. I have leaned over the gunwale of the steamer, and, on the clear depths below, seen droves of these birds chased in front of us.

The mission work is progressing. Souls are panting after God. Just recently, an instructor in one of the Sumoto mills, to the surprise of pastor and congregation, brought a whole platoon of working girls to the Sunday morning service. In the afternoon she brought another crowd. To what purpose? She came to lead them to the fountain where, just the Sunday before, she got her own soul-thirst quenched. She landed at the mission chapel about 11 P.M., pounding at the doors till the sleeping pastor and his wife were awakened. She said: "I want you to teach me the Bible way." Thank God, she returned home at midnight, a happy soul!

At present we have here four regular chapels, with their respective pastors. Each one of these places forms a nucleus for evangelistic work, and there are a goodly number of Sunday Schools in the surrounding villages. But there are scores of smaller and larger villages, which, for the lack of means and workers, receive the Gospel only once a year or so. At one point as many as fifty or more of the pupils attend the prayer meeting, in which many participate. These youths demonstrate the effectiveness of Gospel teaching in various ways. A few others of our Sunday School boys, while attending public school, were put to a critical test by their teachers. The question was, Which of the different religions had the most adherents in this school? Among the fifty or sixty pupils, the Buddhists were

THE MORE ABUNDANT LIFE

TEXT: John 10:10—"I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly."

THE Father is not satisfied with his children living a dying life. "Behold what manner of love he has bestowed upon us," that we should have life more abundantly. Jesus said, "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." Trees, plants and animals are said to live; so do savages and cannibals; but it remains for the soul, born from above, to enjoy the life that is more abundant.

Human existence is classified by Jesus as moral death and the more abundant life. Jesus declares a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. Rather, life is spiritual, and consists in the power of preservation and happiness.

Extending from the wild life of plain and forest, far beyond the natural life of three-score years and ten, the abundant life abounds unto an endless eternity. Jesus revealed this heavenward way. His resurrection brought life and immortality to light, and made possible the extension of the natural period of a man's life to that of an endless life.

The Christian's life is the long life. The balm for extending the life of a dying soul is life in God. What oxygen is to the blood, faith in Jesus is to the perishing spirit of mortal man—an elixir abounding more and more unto the perfect day. Witch doctors, nor skilled and trained medical hands, can supply the fading power of a mortal soul. Where every earthly ministration fails and life ends, the Gospel of faith in an abundant life begins.

Nor is this spiritual strength of a higher life either a mere sentimentality or a transitory enthusiasm. In the pathway of humankind no step of progress is more clearly marked than that occasioned by the entrance of the power of faith within the soul. Therefore, this Gospel of the resurrection is to the unchristianized world the story of an extensive, abundant life, the ripe fruitage of which shall bless the far away, eternal years. The evolution of the soul of man by the truth that is in Christ Jesus reaches out to an everlasting age.

The Abundant Life Intensive

The abundant life is also intensive. That compressed, intense, inner soul power that has wrought the changes of human society in the last two thousand years is a demonstration of the potency of God's regenerate man. Those great reformations, mighty religious revolutions, those upheavals of governments, of religious thought, of the moral standards of society in every nation, are the volcanic disturbances expressive of a tremendous power working its way from the heart outward to the habits and customs of man. It is the more abundant life asserting its intensive power. Such life is one steady stream flowing down through the centuries, making the waste places a garden of paradise and the desert to blossom as a rose!

The life of the natural man is necessarily selfish. He presents the picture of an ignorant, depraved, narrow, hungry and famished life. Every stroke of spirit, mind or body is desperately made for the preservation of self. There is no more convincing deception than the practice of such a policy for the perpetuation of life. But its chemical analysis is, "self being consumed in the fire of self." It is as if a snake, insane over its appetites, should begin at its tail to swallow itself.

To live is as selfish as man. To live more abundantly is as unselfish as God. Living is sponging—taking everything in and giving nothing out. Living more abundantly is following Jesus Christ—giving out everything, even life, and keeping nothing for self. This is the mystery of that doctrine that "he that loseth his life in this world shall keep it unto eternal life." The Christian life gives out as fast as it receives, thus becoming "a well of water springing up unto eternal life." And whosoever drinketh of this water "shall never thirst," but there shall be administered unto him an abundant entrance into the kingdom of God.

Freely of the grace of God Christians have received, freely must they give. Not accumulation, but circulation, is the life principle of "the more abundant life." The heathen lives; so does the chimpanzee. But what is such life but a dying life? The bodies of the heathen are degenerate, and the prey of every disease. Their minds, wrapped in the ignorance of centuries, are neither capable of reasoning nor thinking. Their souls are darkened by a superstition propagated for centuries by a corrupt priesthood. Their souls, minds and bodies have been dwarfed, disfigured and mutilated by an idolatry that has pretended to give life.

The more abundant life is the kernel of the teachings of Jesus. The Father's law of life on creation morn, that life should multiply and fill the earth, was the principle Jesus applied to moral force. According to Jesus, "Except a grain of wheat fall into the ground and die," and through this process multiply, its lot is a lonely and undesirable one—it abideth alone. A light is placed upon a candlestick, that its rays may thus become an abundant benefaction to all who are in the house.

The rich young ruler was taught to sell all he had and give to the poor, and come and give his life in wholesome service for the salvation of the world. The inheritance of eternal life in him was to become the fruitfulness of the kingdom in behalf of others. Nor would Jesus suffer the eye of a disciple to be turned aside from this fruitfulness, but each one must leave all to follow him. A man who would put his hand to the plow and look back cannot fruitfully abound in the kingdom of God, and is refused by Jesus.

And such was the pressure of this expanding, increasing life in Paul that he cried out "Woe is me if I preach not this Gospel of the more abundant life." Its force of presence enlarged his vision of life's fruitfulness until he felt daily the care of all the churches, and his eyes rested with longing upon unvisited and unconquered shores. His message to men everywhere was that "they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ."

The Fruitful Life

The abundant life is the fruitful life. Spiritual, mental and bodily force, once spent in lustful pursuits, is now spent in zealously extending the kingdom. Such is the true mark of discipleship. Neither by baptism nor articulate creed did Jesus say our discipleship should be known. But, "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit: and so shall ye be my disciples." Again, "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away, and every branch that beareth fruit he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." And yet again, "He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit." Barren trees are cursed, and fruitless branches burned. Thus fruitfulness, evangelism, missions, giving, is the true earmark of discipleship. And such fruitfulness, regardless of the names it wore, has marked this discipleship in every land and age. The story of Christianity is the story of the abundant life. The apostasy or faithfulness of the church corresponds to the ebb and flow of its tide of vitality. Every revival of morals or missionary activity in the historic past has sprung only from the fullest lives in God. And true revivals of religion from such sources have been as boundless in their missionary vision as has been the abundant life in its missionary power.

John Wycliffe was a disciple of the abundant life, and the fruitfulness of his labors leaped from isle to mainland, found good soil in Prague, the Bohemian capital, and brought forth John Huss and Jerome, evangelists and martyrs.

Martin Luther was a disciple of the abundant life, and his disciple spirit turned Wittenberg into a Jerusalem, and set all Germany singing the songs of a Protestant evangelism. The fruit of his discipleship was a saved Germany.

John Wesley and George Whitefield were disciples of the abundant life, and their disciple, soul-winning spirit was the fruit-bearing power among Kingswood colliers, the London rabble at Moorfields and Kennington Common, as well as a mighty tempest in the Anglican parishes of England.

Alexander Campbell, Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, "Raccoon" John Smith, Knowles Shaw and others who labored with them were disciples of the abundant life, and their passionate zeal for the salvation of men kindled the mightiest evangelistic company of either Old or New World fame since the days of the apostles. Their hope of uniting the religious forces of Christendom on the New Testament basis for the salvation of the world was a stupendous undertaking and a vision of the larger life. Evangelism, or fruitfulness, was their chief characteristic.

Consecrated Lives

And such disciples, rich in the abundant life, were Morrison, Judson, Carey, Wharton, Livingstone and others. A life overflowing, poured out for others; an evangelistic, a missionary life; an abundant life in Jesus Christ our Lord. In all these the abundant life flowed out profusely, watering barren continents and races, and bringing forth bountiful harvests to the Lord. Theirs was passionate living. Men who have been enlivened by the spirit of Jesus no longer live of themselves, but Jesus Christ liveth in them. Persuaded by the personal example of Jesus, they present their bodies as a living sacrifice to God, their biographers bearing them record that first of all, in their abounding life, they "gave themselves" to the Lord.

Nor is this abundant living to heralds of the Gospel alone. The rope-holders, the supporters of missionaries, have it to their record that "beyond their power" have they succored the laborers and the needy. Deprived of the privilege of giving "utterance" to their hope, they "abound in faith, knowledge, and in all earnestness and in love to one another," and also in the grace of giving. They have labored and believed that it is his will that the abundance of the Christian life in everything shall become a supply at this present time to minister to the need of others. They have joined the great crowd of missionaries, evangelists and martyrs in presenting their bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto the Lord, counting it only a reasonable service. Such are not in bondage to the tithe system. They may give, not less, but more than a mere tithe to God. Not of the priesthood of Levi, but of Melchizedek, and in these last days of Jesus, is our ministry.

Abounding in Liberality

When John Wesley's income was $150 he lived on $140 and gave $10 away. When his salary was increased to $600, he still lived on $140 and gave $460 to missions. Like the Corinthians, "in a great trial of affliction the abundance of his joy and his deep poverty abounded unto the riches of his liberality."

Some years ago a young man graduated from Princeton. He volunteered for the foreign field. The physical examination proved that he would not be able to endure the strenuous life of a missionary in a tropical land. He went into business, and has been successful. Since he began to acquire a competence he has set apart a certain portion each year for foreign mission work. Last year he not only supported a missionary, but gave in addition in the neighborhood of $2,000 toward a house in China for his sister, who, inspired by his example, went out a few years ago as a missionary. In this man "the more abundant life" entered the money markets of the world and compelled base things to declare the "more excellent way."

Hon. Alpheus Hardy in youth had a burning desire to train himself in college to be a minister. His health broke down and he was forced to give up even his pursuit of a college education. The painful cry of his crushed heart was, "I cannot be God's minister." In his distress he threw himself on the floor and wept aloud. But ere long, through his tears, there appeared to him a new vision. It was clear to him that he could make his business life a sacred calling and that he could make money for God. With this new idea of life he joyfully arose and went to Boston and engaged in the merchant marine trade to make money for God. God worked with him, and his profits were abundantly increased. During the sixties a young Japanese lad, having heard of Christianity, his soul burning within him for a Christian education, fled from his native land and was in hiding at Shanghai, China, waiting for a chance to escape to America. Hither the Father brought a

A CHRISTIAN SOLDIER PASSES AWAY

IN the death of Major-General Oliver Otis Howard, U. S. A., the nation loses one who has long been one of its foremost citizens, a brilliant soldier, a practical philanthropist, a popular author and orator and a model Christian. General Howard was all of these. Few men in public life in a generation have been more universally loved and respected, and his death, even at the ripe age of seventy-nine, causes general sorrow.

Mrs. Howard

General Howard passed away at his home in Burlington, Vt., on October 26, of heart disease. He had been in his usual health, and had returned from a Canadian lecturing trip only the day before. He was seated in his chair when the fatal seizure came, and he expired without a struggle. Burlington went into mourning when the news of his death became known, for his fellow-townsmen had a great love for the gallant old soldier-philanthropist.

General Howard was born at Leeds, Kennebec County, Me., on November 8, 1830, the oldest of three children. At sixteen he entered Bowdoin College, and afterward went to West Point Military Academy, where he was graduated fourth in his class in 1854. At the call of President Lincoln for volunteers he offered his services to the Governor of Maine and was placed at the head of the Third Regiment, Maine Volunteer Infantry, with the rank of colonel, resigning his commission in the regular Army. He participated in the battle of Bull Run, June 21, 1861, as the commander of the Third Brigade, Third Division. He was assigned to the command of the First Brigade, First Division, Second Army Corps, in 1861. He took a prominent part in the movement toward the Rapahannock in March, 1862, and in the advance on Richmond. At the battle of Fair Oaks, May 31, 1862, he was twice wounded in the right arm and the limb had to be amputated. He commanded a brigade during the Maryland campaign of 1862, until General Sedgwick was wounded, when he took charge of that officer's division. He led the division in the fight of Fredericksburg, and was afterward promoted to the rank of Major-General of Volunteers. In April, 1863, he was ordered to relieve General Sigel as commander of the Eleventh Army Corps, which he led in the fierce battle at Chancellorsville. At Gettysburg, after the fall of General Reynolds, being the ranking officer present, he assumed command of the whole force. The enemy were unable during the entire battle to dislodge him from his position.

General Howard's command was also engaged in the fight at Lookout Valley and at the battle of Chattanooga. On May 12, 1865, General Howard was assigned to the War Department as Commissioner in the Bureau of Refugees and Freedmen. While in that office he established fourteen hundred schools and 782 Sunday Schools for them. In 1874 he was assigned to the Department of the Columbia, and in 1886 was promoted to the rank of major-general and placed in command of the Division of the Pacific. Later, he was assigned to the Division of the East. He was retired November 8, 1894.

With most men, retirement from public service would also have closed their active career, but it was not so with General Howard. It was the beginning for him of a new career of philanthropy. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are familiar with his writings and with the character of his subsequent work, for his articles have frequently appeared in these pages. His energies for many years past have been devoted to the upbuilding of Lincoln University, at Cumberland Gap, Tenn., and he was practically the father and founder of that enterprise, which is a college for the education of the youths of that mountain region. He lectured in all parts of the country in aid of the work, and was the means of raising a large part of the endowment fund for the institution, which is a memorial to Abraham Lincoln, who was General Howard's personal friend.

We have said that Oliver Otis Howard was a Christian soldier. He carried his splendid Christian optimism into all the affairs of life. He was the heart and soul of many a revival, the honored and much-sought guest of churches and religious conventions, and the ardent helper and adviser in a multitude of Christian enterprises. In the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD he was a frequent and welcome visitor. His bright, cheerful talks on religion have delighted the little guests and big folk as well at our Children's Home.

Several years ago, he rode through the Cumberland Mountain range, across the border-lines of several States, and wrote for this journal a series of letters, vividly describing the people of that much-neglected region, by whom he was most enthusiastically welcomed. He enjoyed their hospitality in their mountain cabins, rode with them along the rough hill paths, worshiped with them in their little mountain chapels, and ate and slept in their homes. They quickly came to love the gallant old general. All they had they placed at his disposal, and, as he himself expressed it, "I believe they would have gone through fire and water for me." These mountain people loved the gallant old soldier.

General Howard, besides his other duties, found leisure for authorship. His books on Zachary Taylor, Isabella of Castile, The Nez Percé Indians, The Civil War, and his two-volume Autobiography show the wide range of literature in which he was at home and successful. He will long be remembered as one of the most genial and kindly of America's famous sons—a true type of the Christian soldier and thorough gentleman.

THE MORE ABUNDANT LIFE

ship owned by Alpheus Hardy, on which young Neesima hid himself, revealing himself and offering to work as a sailor after the ship had put to sea. The desire of Neesima's heart was made known to Mr. Hardy, who persuaded the young Jap to enter Phillips Academy for an education at his expense, that being the very school from which he was driven by reason of ill health.

It was God's open door to Mr. Hardy. He was not permitted to complete his education in Phillips Academy, but he would give such training to another. He could not prepare himself to preach God's Word, but he would support and train one who could. After nine years of thorough college training, educated and fully prepared for his work in Japan, prominent persons in this country and the "Sunrise Kingdom" contributed large sums for the establishment of Doshisha College in Kyoto, Japan. Hundreds of pupils were soon thronging its halls of learning. One of the most remarkable revivals of the Japanese renaissance spread from this school. The work of Joseph Hardy Neesima and his school in Japan is an agency for the multiplication of heralds of the Gospel, made possible by the more abundant life in the bosom of a layman who went forth into the business world to make money for God. Substitutionary labor, not anti-missionary efforts and omissionary excuses, characterize the more abundant life of the laymen of the church of God.

In a modest Kentucky home, a half century ago, there resided a gentle-natured family, mothered by a woman who desired that her son should walk in the footsteps of Jesus in his ministry of calling men to repentance. For some good reason this son was never able to fulfil his mother's desire to become a minister, but was thrown upon his own resources in the business world. But even here his heart and his plans were for the kingdom of God. He seems to live for but one purpose, that to make money for the support and service of the Church of Jesus Christ. The heavenly Father has generously blessed his business increase until to-day the unnumbered gifts of R. A. Long have enriched and made possible the enlargement of almost every benevolent and missionary enterprise carried on by the Brotherhood.

A soul goes forth on missions bent, touches and quickens another. The one quickened touches and makes alive still another. Heaven alone will be able to measure the abundance of the increasing life of that initial laborer. Even so the zealous layman, through his money, possesses a multiplying power and shares in the glory of the redemption. Money speaks all languages, possesses the gift of unknown tongues, laughs at discouragements, never breaks down in health, climatic conditions do not worry it, it claims the world as its habitat, and preaches the Gospel in tracts and books long after the hand of the translator has crumbled to dust. The word "abundant" is taken from the Latin word "unda," meaning wave. The great ocean is the home of the wave. There it was born when God made the seas. There it was when great heroes of commerce or discovery sailed forth to conquer its baffling power. There it is this moment—the boundless wave. There it will be when Gabriel calls us home. And this perpetual motion, this ceaseless wave of the sea, rolling on and on through the ages, never ending, and rebounding only to rise and express its power again, is Jesus Christ's picture of the abundant or "boundless life."

Such is the abundant life. Abounding in joy and happiness; in sacrifice and service; in life and in death; in earning and giving; in the tears of the sower and the songs of the reaper; in fertility and fruitfulness; in prayers and in preaching; in the Word and in the Holy Spirit. And from such a state "shall be richly supplied unto you the entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

"Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto him be the glory in the church and in Christ Jesus unto all generations for ever and ever. Amen."

JAPAN'S GREAT STATESMAN GONE

ONE of the most progressive and constructive statesmen of the twentieth century passed from earth, with his work still unfinished, when Prince Ito of Japan was struck down by the hand of a Korean assassin while about to meet the envoy of Russia to settle, if possible, difficulties over the Manchurian Railway. Ito has well been called the "Maker of New Japan," the most respected of the Elder Statesmen and the most trusted adviser of the Emperor. His untimely death is deeply mourned in Japan; in Russia, where he was highly respected, and by many in Korea, where the most patriotic know that his assassination may bring into force more repressive measures.

Prince Ito went to Manchuria for the purpose of holding a conference with the Russian Minister of Finance, M. Kokovsoff. The idea of the conference originated with the Prince, who was arranging for a new Japanese policy in regard to Manchuria. The exact outline of this new policy has never been made public, but it is said by those who know the Prince best that he wished to have a better understanding with Russia on several mooted points, and that he also wished to show the Chinese that his country intended to treat the original owners of the country fairly and that the trade of all countries would be eventually welcome.

The Emperor's consent was secured and, after long and delicate diplomatic negotiations, Russia consented also to the conference. The Russian Minister of Finance declined to enter Japan, but agreed to come to Harbin, in Manchuria. He said he would be unable to discuss political matters, which doubtless Prince Ito wished much to include, but he would discuss financial and technical subjects, such as the status of the Manchurian Railroad, which has been a bone of contention ever since the first rail was spiked into place.

The assassination would never have occurred if the plans for Ito's reception, proposed by the Russians, had been carried out. They expected to string a strong cordon of soldiers and police about the railroad station, where the two envoys were to meet. The Japanese Consul-General, however, wished to give the Japanese residents a chance to give Ito an ovation when the train drew in, so permission was given to his fellow-countrymen to go on the platform. The Korean conspirators entered with them, as there is not one man in a hundred that can tell a Korean from a Japanese when the former doffs his white dress and odd high hat.

The Russian Minister and his suite arrived first. The train bearing the distinguished Japanese statesman pulled in a little before nine in the morning, and a deafening cheer broke from the crowds who rushed to catch a glimpse of the man who had done more than any one else to make Japan a power in the East. Prince Ito advanced with outstretched hand to greet the Russian Minister, when a man jumped through the crowd and fired seven shots from an automatic revolver.

The Late Prince Hirobumi Ito

At once all was confusion, people trying to retreat from the zone of danger and others trying to push forward to see what had occurred. Prince Ito had fallen with three bullets in his body; two others near by were wounded. Surgeons soon saw that his case was hopeless. In a few moments Prince Ito's earthly career had closed forever.

The assassin was captured without difficulty. He had made no attempt to escape, but, flanked on either hand by a Korean, he stood with smoking revolver, awaiting results. As he was disarmed he exclaimed dramatically, "I came to Harbin for the sole purpose of assassinating Prince Ito, to avenge my country." Search was immediately made for others in Harbin who might have been concerned in the plot, but none were found. It is thought that other conspirators, who had a foreknowledge of what would happen at Harbin, may be found in Korea.

Within two hours after Ito had arrived, another train was carrying his body back to the seacoast in a funeral car, filled with flowers, and followed by the lamentations of thousands of Japanese.

At first it was feared that the Japanese government would increase the severity of its rule in Korea, but the government has announced that it would regard the assassination as the act of a few mad conspirators and not take vengeance on the entire country. Prince Ito, who practically ruled Korea with sovereign power for two or more years, although making some enemies, was one of the best friends it had among its conquerors. The Japanese people, as a whole, wish to annex Korea and blot out its national life altogether, and were impatient with the policy of Ito, who said that he wished to develop the country and increase the prosperity of its people.

The Emperor was greatly affected by the news of Prince Ito's death. A warship was sent to bring his body home, a state funeral was planned and royal honors were paid to the remains. This has only occurred three times before since Japan has had a written history. Ito was also advanced to the first court rank from the junior grade, which is considered a high court honor by the Orientals. Condolences were received from many governments. Russia felt particularly sorry, as Prince Ito had shown a spirit of conciliation and fairness since the war, which was greatly appreciated. The world at large has felt that Ito was the balance-wheel in the complicated machinery of Japanese politics and foreign policy.

Prince Ito's life reads like a romance. He was born in 1841. His father was of the Samurai, or fighting, class, but not of the nobility. His parents named him Shunsuke, or Superior Being, but Ito himself later changed this to Hirobumi, which means "Benevolent Literature." This name, however, seems not to have handicapped him in his career. He was adopted by a relative, and taught the profession of arms. It was against the law to leave the country, but he ran away to see the world and went to Europe on a whaler. He returned at the time of the great rebellion, fell under suspicion, was attacked and his life saved by a girl who later became his wife. He became Governor of the first open port of Japan, and then Minister of Public Works. In 1872 he became a member of a traveling embassy to visit the Powers. He did more than any one else toward framing the present constitution, and building up the industries of the country. He was made a count and one of the Elder Statesmen and Premier. It is said that he worked ten years on building up the nation for the Russian war. As he was the most far-seeing statesman in the East, this is likely. He has been called the Bismarck of Japan, but he is, perhaps, more comparable to Von Moltke, the great organizer, who planned for great events long in advance and then saw the years bring them to fruition.

The Cleveland Family Will Go Abroad to Live

THE good wishes of the nation follow Mrs. Grover Cleveland and her children as they sail away for a long sojourn in Europe. The four children are to attend school in Switzerland, and with that charming devotion to her family which has from the first marked the character of Frances Folsom Cleveland she stays close beside them.

Perhaps no woman who has ever appeared under the white light of official publicity in our land has borne the test more nobly than has this typical American lady. Though she has been consistently self-possessed and queenly in bearing, still her modesty has been ever shown in her success in keeping herself and her family out of the papers. Her judgment and self-control have been strongly evidenced in her silence under the bitter attacks of politicians directed against her husband.

Both in and out of the White House, she was greatly beloved. Her grace and beauty, and tact and goodness have all been universally acknowledged.

Few of the occupants of the White House have excelled her. She presents a wonderful assemblage of qualities, and every American wishes that the Europeans might judge of our women by her, rather than by the types which are so often paraded as "the representative American woman."

The Daughters of the Late President Cleveland

Mrs. Cleveland has been spending the summer in her unpretentious country house at Tamworth, N. H. Her beloved home on Buzzard's Bay, in Massachusetts, "Gray Gables," was given up because the children seemed to thrive best under the bracing mountain air.

The "enormous fortune" which his enemies attributed to Mr. Cleveland, and which was said to have been acquired by his intimacy with wicked trust-magnates, has shrunk, in the searching light of truth, to very moderate dimensions. Mrs. Cleveland will live simply and quietly abroad, largely because, as it is said, she cannot afford any other kind of a life. Perhaps no public man of our generation has been so cruelly traduced and vilified as was Grover Cleveland. His career should be, and probably has been, a lesson to us all. His loyal and devoted wife, and his four fine children, have the best wishes of the whole nation as they sail away for an absence of a year or more in Europe.

The two daughters, Misses Esther and Marion, whose portraits are given herewith, are said to be gifted and promising girls and likely to develop into women like their mother, who could ask nothing better for them.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST IN CONVENTION

Thirty-two Thousand Sit Down at the Largest Communion Service the World Has Ever Known

Part of the Great Audience of 25,000 at the Open Air Religious Services of the Disciples' Convention

By Rev. JOHN A. JAYNE

THE Disciples of Christ, better known as the Christian Church, have just closed their Centennial Convention in Pittsburg. This convention, which celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of the beginnings of the Disciple movement, was attended by not less than 42,000 people, from all parts of the world.

From the opening of the convention, on Monday, October 11, to its close, October 19, the greatest enthusiasm prevailed. The gates of Pittsburg's hospitality were flung wide open. The people of the city, of all religious denominations, threw open their homes and made the guests cordially welcome. All the largest halls and churches, including Forbes Field, the home of the Pittsburg baseball club, were used for the meetings. Carnegie Hall, which seats 2,500; Duquesne Garden, with a capacity of 6,000, and Luna Park, which can take care of 3,000, were filled to the overflow at all the sessions of the convention, which were held simultaneously.

The event of the week was the great communion service, held in Forbes Field Sunday afternoon, October 17, and attended by 32,000 people. In this service, which was the largest communion service ever known, the people were as quiet and orderly as if they had been gathered in a church of the most ultra-conservative thought. Five hundred deacons and one hundred elders served the people. One hundred and forty-four gallons of wine and hundreds of loaves of unleavened bread were required in this service. The singing, which was entirely congregational, was led by a chorus of two hundred mixed voices, which received its keynote from eight cornetists, massed, and all playing the soprano parts. The free-will offering that was taken for the board of ministerial relief amounted to nearly $3,000.

On Saturday afternoon preceding the communion service a great veteran campfire was held in the First United Presbyterian Church, participated in by the pioneers of the Disciple organization, all of whom were over seventy years of age. This service was led by the venerable L. L. Carpenter, of Wabash, Ind. The "church dedicator," Mr. Carpenter, has dedicated more than 1,500 churches and raised over $3,000,000 for the payment of church building debts.

One of the most interesting features of the convention was the dedication of the missionary boat, Oregon, which was built in Pittsburg and paid for by the Oregon State Missionary Society. This boat, which will be used for missionary work on the Congo River in Africa, cost $15,000. After its completion, it will be taken apart and shipped to the Congo region. It will cost $7,000 to get the boat to its destination and assemble it ready for use.

Special trains were run to the convention from many of the great cities of the country. Des Moines, Ia.; Kansas City, Mo.; St. Louis, Mo.; Chicago, Ill.; Cleveland, O., and Cincinnati, O., each sent special trains, while a great number of Christian churches within one hundred miles of Pittsburg chartered trains for the communion service on Sunday, holding their Sunday School exercises en route.

Eighteen years ago the annual convention of the Disciples was held in the First Church, North Side, Pittsburg. Then there were 714 delegates in attendance, and the entire membership of the church was considerably less than 500,000. To-day there are 1,330,000 members, and the church now ranks sixth among religious organizations in the United States. Starting just one hundred years ago, this "Restoration Movement," as the Disciples term it, has grown to be one of the great factors in American religious life.

IN THE HEART OF "OLD JAPAN"

in the lead, then the Shintoists, etc.; at last there were just these three or four Christian boys, who bravely showed their colors, though scoffed at by the rest, as the apparent losers in the contest. Next in order was the question, What does each one know of its respective religion? As the others had practically nothing to say (in this respect they are not at all behind the great mass of their elders), these courageous Sunday School boys made their defense. With great clearness they told of the God of the Bible, the one true God; that he is both loving and just, and forgives our sins. Then they gave quite an account of Jesus the Saviour, ending by relating how he is now sitting at the right hand of the Father in heaven. At this point the others, filled with shame, enviously yelled out, "That's a lie!" But the teachers justly decided that these boys had won the contest, whereupon all were called on to shout "Banzai!"

Among our Christians and church attendants are all classes, educated and refined as well as those from the poorest fisher families. We have professional men, school teachers, farmers and soldiers. Where at one place the preaching is listened to by attentive students, at another crowds of fishermen, and their women, with teeth painted black, smoking tobacco wrapped cigar-shaped in a green leaf, and with children on their backs, stand spellbound in large crowds around the street preacher. At this latter place is where we also get our soldier converts. Here upon the may hills facing the narrow strait, through which the foreign steamers pass into Kobe harbor, are the batteries with their yawning guns.

The missionary with a good bicycle can cover a good deal of ground, and keep himself blessedly busy. Some of the roads are in most excellent condition in the interior, leading through quite a number of small tunnels. In places almost for miles massive, ivy-clad pines, with long limbs, form a canopy of green overhead. Almost all around the island winds a typical military road, which though rather narrow for smoothness and natural ornamentation surpasses some American boulevards. When closely edging the sea, it is built upon solid rock, artistically buttressed on the coast side with stone blocks. "Let them . . . declare his praise in the islands."

"In the Blanket Business"

CONSUL-GENERAL HANNA, our American representative at Monterey, is proving himself an official who is emphatically "on deck" in an emergency. Almost single-handed, he is directing relief work in two Mexican States. Carloads of corn and other foodstuffs, with bulky consignments of clothing, are pouring in upon him from all quarters north of the border. His consulate is a general relief station, where thousands of appeals are received and passed upon, and where the big task of ministering to the needs of the multitude is directed with a skill and judgment that very few save a cool, clear-headed, trained American possess in any noticeable degree. Knowing the extent and character of the suffering, Mr. Hanna jocosely yet kindly advised that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family "go into the blanket business," and he would personally appeal to the farmers for food. The wisdom of his suggestion has been justified by the eager joy with which the first 5,000 blankets were received by the crowds of poor beneficiaries. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has just sent to the Consul-General 15,000 additional blankets and 100 American sewing machines. These blankets, Mr. Hanna assures us, will afford the most welcome kind of relief, and our generous-hearted readers will now have the satisfaction of knowing that 20,000 homeless women and children are protected from the cold and that at least a hundred poor Mexican families will become self-supporting.

It is not at all improbable that this "blanket business" may become the largest factor in the cementing of American and Mexican friendship in the future. It will keep that friendship warm. More eloquent than words, more convincing than fine diplomatic phrases are kind actions that spring from generous impulses. The aid spontaneously extended by the American people to the 30,000 sufferers in the two Mexican States will have a far-reaching influence on the future relations of the two countries. We congratulate every one who has had a share in the "blanket business," and we are thankful that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should have been providentially chosen as the channel of this worthy benevolence.

Send in your gift to our Mexican Relief Fund now, that it may be most effectively used.

God's blessing will surely rest upon all who have helped to succor our Southern neighbors in their time of need.

The President's Speaking Tour

THE President's tour of the country is furnishing a pleasing topic for many newspapers just now. He is meeting all sorts of people, mostly nice, sensible folks, of course; but here and there he encounters a spice of criticism, which no doubt adds zest to his travels and makes him wish he were well home again. His speeches have been well received, because they have in them the ring of sincerity. He has discussed a multitude of topics, including the tariff, a national central bank, labor combinations, and—most frequently of all—good American citizenship. His best efforts have been given to discussing the great question of our national waterways, about which he has given sound advice, that should be followed. On the rear platform, he has proved himself a diplomatic car talker, equal to any ordinary occasion, and quite capable of successfully resisting the temptation—to which his predecessor would have easily yielded—of saying startling original things.

Two Heroes

TWO military heroes have just passed away, whose careers we record elsewhere. Prince Ito, who has been called "the brains of Japan," fell by the hand of an assassin in Manchuria, where the difficult task of administering the affairs of the territory acquired by Japanese conquest brought upon him the bitter enmity of men hostile to his government. Prince Ito was an Oriental, who combined, in a phenomenal degree, the higher qualities of the soldier, the statesman and the executive. For a full generation, the story of his life has been a part of his country's history. He did more than any of his contemporaries toward shaping the destinies of the "new Japan." He was a consistent and cordial friend of America. For such a leader among the appreciative Orientals, who worship great talents, there was no tribute too high to pay. He has been decreed "royal honors" by the Emperor, the greatest gift that can come to any Japanese.

Oliver Otis Howard, who passed away on the same day upon which Prince Ito died, was the highest type of the American soldier. Brave and skilful on the field of action, he was gifted in many other ways. On the platform, in authorship and in philanthropy, he stood among the foremost. His long life was that of a consecrated Christian. His optimistic religion shone out in all he did and said and wrote. As founder and promoter of the Lincoln University for the youth of the Cumberlands, his noble, unselfish work has been the means of placing great educational advantages within the reach of a large and worthy class of young men, hitherto neglected. That work will be a lasting monument to his name. He was a frequent and valued contributor to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and was ever ready to co-operate with its readers in good enterprises. General Howard's friends have often remarked that the years subsequent to his military retirement were in many ways the most productive of his whole life. Now, the gallant old soldier has been summoned to headquarters, to make report to the great Captain of Salvation. His country will long remember him with love and admiration.

"Suffragist" and "Suffragette"

MRS. PANKHURST, the leader of the militant suffrage movement in Great Britain, is a bright, aggressive, original woman. At a recent public gathering in her honor in New York she gave a new definition of the much-discussed terms "suffragist" and "suffragette." "The suffragist," said she, "is a woman who wants something, don't you know? and the suffragette is a woman who not only wants it, but means to get it, don't you see?" This is the lady's playful way of explaining the militant doctrine which has caused so many lively scrimmages in the British Parliament and at the homes of various cabinet officials, tactics which, she affirms, were first suggested by so distinguished a leader as Mr. Balfour. But American women are not quite ready to accept her definition, nor her justification. Already the Boston wing of the suffrage army—which claims to be the oldest in the movement—has taken steps to let Mrs. Pankhurst and her friends know that we do not approve of riotous methods. The "flying wedge" and "rough-house" may be tolerated on the football field, but are to be regarded as a doubtful innovation in politics.

Where Comparison Is Invited

EVERY fall the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in addition to making arrangements to give his readers the most up-to-date articles, the best stories and the brightest pictures, also searches the publication field for the most attractive premiums to offer with America's foremost religious and family weekly. Although the premiums given during past seasons have been the best that could be secured, and elicited warm expressions of thanks and praise from thousands of readers, yet we feel this year as if all previous efforts had been surpassed. They are of such a high standard of excellence, and are so attractive to the general reader, that comparison with those offered by any other paper is cheerfully invited, as we feel confident of the result.

Books of mere transitory interest have not been selected, but those offered will be of value as long as they exist. No family can afford to be without the indispensable emergency volume, Before the Doctor Comes. It is a life-saver in time of illness or of sudden accident, written by two physicians who have given us the latest dictum of modern science. Hero Tales from American Life is a book that will be read time and again with increasing pleasure and profit. Mrs. Sangster's name is known in every American home as an author who is always bright, always interesting, always uplifting. The Story Bible is one of the best books that has come from her facile pen. It should be placed in the hands of every boy and girl, and we imagine that the old folks will eagerly await the opportunity to peruse its pages. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Red Letter Bible and the Red Letter Testament need no recommendation. They are standard, and no home library is complete without them. To the Sunday School teacher and scholar they are a weekly help; to the father and mother, a daily comfort and inspiration.

The beautiful "Dreamland" Calendar, given to every reader, will be framed in many a home after the days numbered beneath have passed into history. The few moments required to get better acquainted with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD premiums, as described on two other pages of this issue, could not be better spent for your own advantage.

Consul-General Hanna's Thanks

RESPONDING to Dr. Klopsch's telegram announcing the sending of 15,000 additional blankets (making 20,000 in all) and 100 sewing machines for the flood sufferers in Monterey, Mexico, United States Consul-General Hanna telegraphs this acknowledgment of the generous gift from our readers:

"MONTEREY, MEXICO, October 29.

"Dr. Louis Klopsch, Christian Herald, New York:

"Your telegram of yesterday fills my heart with joy and gratitude, and in behalf of the needy people I want to most heartily thank you and the great CHRISTIAN HERALD family for your glorious co-operation. You will bring blessings and comfort to thousands of needy homes. The good people of Texas and the Southern States are sending me rice, beans and corn, and clothing is arriving from many parts. We are conducting a Red Cross Hospital in Monterey, caring for the afflicted here. Wells-Fargo Company have been thanked for free transportation.

GENERAL NOTES

—THAT DISTINGUISHED English scientist, Sir James Crichton-Browne, has discovered a new factor in compassing the downfall of nations. Wars, he says, drained Greece and moral laxity enfeebled her, but the insignificant mosquito brought about her ultimate ruin. Heretofore, historians have attributed the decline of the ancient Grecian and Roman civilization and national greatness to altogether different causes: to the spread of irreligion, the loss of high ideals, the decay of patriotism, the lowering of moral standards and to shameless corruption and extravagance. Now that the mosquito theory is out with scientific endorsement, who knows to what extent it may yet be shown to have caused the obliteration of many other once great nations? The Nile marshes, the one-time Sahara sea, the great Kara-Korum desert, and our own "staked plains" may all have been the breeding place of race-extinguishing pests in long past ages. The obvious moral is: if we desire long life as a nation, let us, by all means, avoid the grosser errors and indulgencies that have involved other nations in ruin, but let us, first and foremost, put our foot down firmly, figuratively speaking, and squelch that universal robber of energy and disseminator of ague, malaria, yellow fever and sleeping sickness—the mosquito.

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

Conducted by FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Militant Female Suffrage

MRS. PANKHURST, the English suffragette, faced an audience which crowded to the limit Carnegie Hall, in New York, the other evening. Every seat was taken from orchestra to top gallery, and crowds were standing. Police Captain Post, with Lieutenant Walsh and twenty-five other policemen, were on guard at first. The number of policemen was increased to 125. Most of the people in the audience were women. Mrs. Pankhurst was escorted to the platform by Mrs. Staunton Blatch, president of the Equality League. She was attractively gowned in a mauve Empire frock of velvet. The lining of the large, loose sleeves was of a dull shade of green, little danglers hanging from them, green embroidery in the front, with a hint of a green skirt of the same shade beneath, and with the white of the close-fitting undersleeves and the neck making the three colors of the English suffragette —purple, white and green. Mrs. Pankhurst was wearing a facsimile of her prison badge. Among other things, Mrs. Pankhurst said: "I do not think I should have come to you this fall if I had not been invited by the League for Self-Supporting Women, but I know what it is to be a self-supporting woman without a vote. I know you have not all come here to-night because you are interested in suffrage. You have come to see what a militant suffragette looks like." In her peroration she held that, as right-mindedness and honor in the man and right-mindedness and virtue in the woman are necessary to the ideal home, so the right-mindedness and honor of manhood and the nobility and right-mindedness of womanhood are needed in the makeup and management of an ideal state. It is said that Mrs. Pankhurst, by her own unaided efforts, earned money enough to send four children through the English universities, and such heroic service is to be highly commended; but her boisterous advocacy of female suffrage and her violent warfare on the government at London has had a tendency to bring the cause she espoused into contempt on the part of many of the best people, even the friends of universal suffrage, and such tactics indulged in in this country would retard very materially the progress of the cause which is now gaining so many friends in every direction. Mrs. Pankhurst's calm, deliberate address in Carnegie Hall was in marked contrast to some of her performances on the other side of the sea, and if her pacific spirit were to be continued here she would make many new friends for the cause of female suffrage. Wrath and warfare are unnatural and improper weapons when used by women in support of woman suffrage, as they have been by the suffragettes of England, and wisdom has been illustrated in the dropping of those weapons in the advocacy of female suffrage in this country.

Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry. (Eccles. 7 : 9.)

Well Digger Entombed

John Cussen, who lived with his father on a farm near Central Islip, L. I., was engaged in digging a well on his father's place when the supports which held the dirt back gave way and the sides caved in, burying him beneath a mountain of sand. He had thirty feet of pipe in the well, and was at the sixty-foot level adjusting the next length when the accident happened. The alarm was given, and more than five hundred neighbors worked heroically to extricate him, but as the soil was sandy it was necessary for them to sink a shaft beside the one that was closed. Although relays of men were busily engaged, it took about ten days of digging before the body of the unfortunate man was recovered. This misfortune excited the attention and sympathy of thousands of people in the community, and hundreds of hands were willing to toil eagerly for the rescue of his life, if possible, or his dead body from the tomb. How much more important is it for us to interest ourselves in the salvation of those who are in danger of, and who are being buried beneath, the sand of sin! The attempt to rescue Cussen seemed a hopeless task from the start, but haste and diligence upon the part of Christ's followers will result in the successful reclamation of their fellows from the broken wells of temptation and sin.

I will seek that which was lost. (Ezek. 34 : 16.)

First Ballot in China

China has awakened out of her slumber of thousands of years, and is recognizing the signs and demands of the times. She has gone so far on the path of progress as to give her millions a voice in her government. October 14 marked an era in the establishment of constitutional government in China. In obedience to the imperial decrees of October, 1907, and July, 1908, ordering the establishment of provincial deliberative assemblies, elections were held and the assemblies met for the first time on that Thursday in October. The edict issued renewed the imperial admonitions to the members of the assemblies regarding their deliberations, and to the viceroys and governors regarding their supervision of the deliberations. It also exhorted all to display loyal patriotism, that there might come strength and prosperity to the country. This is one of the most significant events in the history of the Chinese empire. Up to seventy-five years ago an absolute despotism was considered the strongest type of government; now it is counted the weakest, and has been driven from almost every nation. Less than forty years ago the Mikado commenced giving his power away to the people of Japan, and the more he gave to the people the stronger he became and the more prosperous his government. In granting a representative form of government China has now come into line with other nations, adopting God's ideal of human government and opening wider the gateways for a victorious Christianity. Jesus Christ the King has limited the monarchies and created the democracies of the world. His truth gives freedom to the nations of the earth as well as to the individual heart.

The Late Justice R. W. Peckham

The Reception in New York to Mrs. Pankhurst, the English Suffragette

If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. (John 8 : 36.)

Singing Insects

Raymond L. Ditmars, curator of reptiles in the Bronx Zoo, in New York, has recently captured three locusts and four crickets, which are good singers. In speaking of their musical talent the curator said: "This locust," pointing with a hatpin, "sings exactly like the hiss of a snake; this one like the music of castanets, a popular musical instrument of Spain. This little cricket's voice sounds like one silver coin striking against another. This cricket here I call the sleighbell cricket. Listen and you will hear the bells." Touching the cricket lightly on the shoulder with the hatpin, the little creature made melody very much like the music of sleighbells heard at a distance over the snow. "The tree cricket just here," said Mr. Ditmars, "is about as melodious as an alarm clock, but we have him in the choir to furnish a contrast." With all the misfortunes of earth, there is more pleasure than pain everywhere in nature with men and among the lower tribes. Most of the days of the little tribes are full of happiness, and the creatures are armed with the instruments with which that happiness is expressed. What an inspiration to harmony and thanksgiving to God we should have as we see his tiny creatures in the grass, trees and air, doing their duty in their humble spheres and singing the praises of their Creator.

Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord. Praise ye the Lord. (Ps. 150 : 6.)

Ideal Judge Dead

Rufus W. Peckham, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, died at Coolmoore, his summer home, at Altamont, Albany County, N. Y., the night of October 24. He was born in Albany in 1838, the youngest son of Rufus Wheeler Peckham, Judge of the Court of Appeals of New York, who, with his wife, was drowned in the shipwreck of the Ville de Havre in 1873 while on his way to Europe for his health. As prosecuting attorney, in his younger days, he was a terror to evil doers. He had been a Justice of the Supreme Court of New York from 1883 until 1896, when he was appointed Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court at Washington by President Cleveland. His associates on the bench at Washington were greatly grieved at his removal, and there was a feeling of genuine sorrow throughout the legal profession. When Justice Harlan heard the news of his death, he said: "It is a great loss to the country. Justice Peckham was one of the ablest jurists who ever sat on the American bench. He was absolutely pure in mind and thought, and free from everything which would prevent him from rendering an honest judgment in any case brought before him. He had strong political convictions, but when on the bench he knew no litigant's politics and cared nothing for it. His sole desire was to administer the law as it was, and to give each party in every case his just rights."

Governor Hughes, when informed of the death of Judge Peckham, said he was "one of the greatest jurists that this country has produced. In ability and strength of character he was worthy of the best traditions of the bench, and his service in the Supreme Court is one of the finest contributions New York has made to the nation. We had no better judge." The judiciary is the safeguard of American institutions. It is fortunate for our country that ability and integrity have so generally characterized the judges of our higher courts. We raise large crops of grain in our land, we take out vast quantities of metal from our mines, we have material thrift of every kind and fabulous wealth; but our best production and richest treasure are represented in the ability and integrity of such men as Rufus W. Peckham, the just judge.

Artaxerxes, the famous and mighty king of Persia, knowing that there could not be a healthful state without a pure judiciary, authorized Ezra in the decree which he made to select judges in Israel who were God-fearing men.

And thou, Ezra, after the wisdom of thy God, that is in thine hand, set magistrates and judges, which may judge all the people that are beyond the river, all such as know the laws of thy God. (Ezra 7 : 25.)

The Richest Women in the World

IT is true that many of the very rich conceal the extent of their prosperity from the general public. This is from various motives, but usually it is from the very obvious one that they are over-run with beggars if their wealth is widely known. A noted journalist was wont to say that every week he learned of the existence, though often not until his death, of some enormously rich man who had succeeded in keeping from all but a small inner circle his exact financial status. Consequently it is possible that richer women exist than those who are named in this list.

Most of the very rich women in the world have inherited their wealth from a father or husband. Mrs. Green is an exception. Beginning with only a moderate fortune at the inception of her career, she has by shrewd investments and lucky speculation multiplied it many times.

The Duchess of Roxburgh was Miss May Goelet, a daughter of the late Ogden Goelet, of Newport, R. I. She is accredited with the possession of $20,000,000.

Frau Von Bohlen Holbach is supposed to control $80,000,000, which came to her from her father, the grandson of the noted inventor of the Krupp gun. By one of the strange paradoxes in which history abounds, Baron Krupp, who made his money in implements of war, offered great prizes to those who would help in the promotion of peace. Frau Holbach is a sister of Mrs. Herman Oelrichs, of New York, who is herself something of a financier, since she has multiplied by eight her original fortune of half a million. Possibly her distinguished husband has helped somewhat to this end.

Mrs. Hetty Green, whose personal economies and eccentricities have for years kept her before the public continually, is worth about $30,000,000.

Mrs. Gladys Vanderbilt Szechenyi, whose romantic marriage to a Hungarian noble of moderate fortune is still fresh in the memory of newspaper readers, has about $12,500,000 in her own right.

Mrs. A. Weightman Walker, the wife of a manufacturer of chemicals in Philadelphia, is supposed to have at least $80,000,000, which is also estimated as the size of the inheritance left to our own beloved Mrs. Russell Sage by her husband.

The Marchioness of Graham is a daughter of the twelfth Duke of Hamilton, who has been called the richest of the English peers.

Señora Cousino is one of the great South American heiresses, having come from Chile.

Helen Gould, who has used her immense wealth so wisely and generously as to endear her to all her countrymen, has probably something like $15,000,000 still in her coffers. Nobody begrudges her the money. She knows how to spend it nobly.

The business ability of women is more generally recognized in Europe than in our own country. All observant travelers must have remarked the astonishing (to an American) number of small shops and hotels on the Continent, and even in Great Britain, which are controlled entirely by women—keen, enterprising and successful. No doubt as much business talent exists in our own land. Since women are engaging more and more in mercantile pursuits, it is not unlikely that some among them may ere long amass great fortunes for themselves. Many, both in Europe and America, are already earning large salaries, and have managed to gather together comfortable fortunes. KATE UPSON CLARK.

OUR "DREAMLAND" CALENDAR

The Most Superb Calendar Ever Issued by Us

WE are indeed happy that we are able to offer this year to the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family the most superb Art Calendar we have ever produced, The "Dreamland" Calendar.

Every year that this paper has given away a calendar as a token of good will to each subscriber to America's foremost family paper—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—the recipients have written us by the tens of thousands expressing their heartfelt thanks and appreciation.

Each one in the past has been a gem, but the new "Dreamland" Calendar, we say without hesitation, surpasses all previous efforts in this line.

The picture was painted by the world-famous French artist, Charderon, whose beautiful paintings of children are unequaled by the painters of any land. He stands alone in his chosen field, and of his many wonderful pictures, which stir the heart and awaken the most tender emotion—the love of God's little ones—the sleeping child in "Dreamland" is his crowning work.

You should not miss the wonderful opportunity, so generously offered, to secure a reproduction of this picture. It is printed in a tone so beautiful, so delicate, that the fact that it is but a picture passes from one in a moment, and it seems to be a living, breathing child of entrancing beauty, only wanting the touch of a kiss upon its cheeks to awaken it with a smile on its lips and love and laughter in its questioning eyes.

The Calendar is given free to every new and renewing subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Please tell all your friends about it.

CLOSE OF AUSTRALIA'S GREAT REVIVAL

FROM the time that Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Mr. Charles M. Alexander and their mission party arrived in Australia until the closing week, they conducted, almost without respite, a wonderful series of evangelistic meetings throughout the length and breadth of the commonwealth. In sixteen weeks they traveled over 5,000 miles by rail, visited the principal cities and towns, and conducted meetings at almost every hour of the day and night. Everywhere they left behind them a true revival, and cities and towns are to-day thanking God for the spiritual uplift they received.

Each worker was a specialist in his or her own department of the work, and each worked with a system. Mr. and Mrs. William Asher conducted services in billiard-rooms, in public-house bars and in the slums. Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Norton held meetings for personal workers. George T. B. Davis promoted the work of the Pocket Testament League. In the four months 75,000 New Testaments were distributed.

Converted Australian Aborigines

They accepted Christ during the Chapman-Alexander Revival

The revival meetings attracted the largest audiences yet seen in Australia. Melbourne had, perhaps, the greatest crowds. In Sydney, the Town Hall was packed night after night. Adelaide provided an aggregate attendance of 114,000 at a fortnight's meetings, while Ballarat sent 10,000 to the meetings every day. In each city Mr. Alexander had large trained choirs, those in Melbourne and Sydney numbering over 1,200 singers.

The final day in Melbourne had a full programme. It included an address to ministers, a Parliamentary luncheon, a monster farewell demonstration in the Exhibition Building and a procession of 5,000 people through the city streets to the railway station. In Sydney, the last day culminated in a farewell demonstration on the wharf.

The Chapman-Alexander mission has kindled a flame of spiritual fire that will spread with ever-increasing force throughout Australia. It has quickened the churches into new life and created new ideals. Thousands have been led to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ.

HIS FIGHTING CHANCE

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE woods near Elsinore were beautiful the year round, but they were incomparable for verdure and fragrance on the edge of summer. Then not only were the trees magnificent as they lifted their splendid stature to the sky, the green branches giving homes to great numbers of birds, but rhododendron and wild honeysuckle made clumps of bloom and hives of sweetness in the long winding paths and in the openings here and there to the sun. Elsinore was in New England, but the people who had lived there a century ago had given the place another name, a name no longer on the map. Little by little the old settlers had passed away, and the farms they had cultivated and the forests they had loved had alike passed into the hands of newcomers from northern Europe. In the graveyard on the hill there were white stones, inscribed to the memory of fathers and mothers whose children were to-day piling up fortunes in New York and Chicago. The newcomers had named the village that grew up between the woods and the bay Elsinore. Hither, one summer, came a young doctor and his wife to find their first home, and lay as they hoped the foundations of future prosperity. John Folsom had a thin, eager face, and the pallor of one who has burned the midnight oil and studied late and long in college days. He had been known at the university as a grind, and at the medical school and during the period when he was a hospital interne he had toiled strenuously. Ethel, his young wife, had been engaged to him since their school days. Her family and intimate friends had not been favorable to her marriage, not merely because Dr. Folsom was poor and had a hard road before him, but because they thought him too grave and self-centred to be a good life companion for a girl so gay, bright and fun-loving as Ethel. No opposition sufficed to daunt Ethel's courage or shake her steadfast faith in John, and on his part he gave her the tribute of a single-hearted adoration, worshiping her as if she were a queen.

Mr. Deering, Ethel's father, had offered to buy a city practice, or a share in one, for his son-in-law, but John had his own independence and preferred to invest his little patrimony in an abandoned farm near the scene of his happiest years, those of his early childhood. He had ascertained that there was no doctor in the neighborhood and that one was sorely wanted, and with Ethel's consent he resolved to begin the practice of his profession in this rural community, that had become largely Danish and Swedish. Out of this immigration a new type of Americans was to be manifested.

Patients came slowly at first, and the Folsoms had time for much rambling in the beautiful wood-paths, returning from their walks with arms full of flowers to beautify their living room. Presently, however, as Dr. Folsom's skill became known, he had less time on his hands, and when it was discovered that he had the nerve and delicacy of a surgeon and could perform critical operations at need his margin of leisure became very small. Ethel found herself often solitary, and especially at night, when the doctor was away often for hours, she grew desperately lonely and had to make a stand against depression.

Before a year had gone by, during the time indeed when the snows lay thick in the forest aisles and the birds had flown to the South, Ethel was aware of a new reason for apprehension. John had never been physically strong. His wife at first did not venture to question the wisdom of his course when she saw him resort to a stimulant to renew his strength or to keep him from taking cold after a long drive. When later she found that he was growing sleepless, and that when he was most in need of rest his eyes were wide open, his brain active, so that none of the usual efforts to rout insomnia were of the least avail, she became alarmed. But once or twice the doctor told her not to worry herself; that he must have sleep at any cost, and that he thought it better to take a harmless drug that would induce sleep than to be unfit for the next day's work. The argument seemed reasonable, and Ethel dismissed anxiety, until she could not deceive herself any longer. It became all too soon evident to the loving wife that her brilliant and gifted husband was becoming a victim to the most insidious and deadly drug in materia medica. The victim of alcohol is not fettered with chains so closely interwoven and so binding upon soul and body as the slave whose fetters are welded by morphine.

Ethel noted the small, half-suggested signs of the despotic habit for weeks before she ventured to remonstrate with a passion of tears. One day she broke down altogether. The victim of morphia gradually yields not only in the minor morals, but in the major ethics, to the dominion of the vice. Dr. Folsom ceased to be as truthful as he had been, he forgot appointments, he was not to be trusted with the unreserve that is given to the faithful physician. His wife saw it, and one day, when she had in vain tried to secure from him a promise to let the evil thing alone, she threw herself on the floor beside her chair, buried her face in her hands and broke into a storm of sobs. Thus her husband found her. He had bidden her good-by for the day, and she had not expected him back. In an instant, as he entered the room, he was at her side tenderly lifting her up, and his arms went around her. In that moment there came over him the gloom of a deep remorse. He was embracing not merely his wife whom he loved, but the mother of his unborn child. A few months more and that child would be in their home.

"She broke into a storm of sobs"

"Ethel, darling," he said, "is this what you do as soon as I am out of sight? Am I breaking your heart? Am I killing you? O God, forgive me!"

Her head was on his shoulder, and she tried to stop her weeping, but she could not without a struggle.

"This is not good for you, dear," he pleaded, "nor good for the one that is coming. Tell me, my dear, what it is that has so discouraged you."

"John," replied the wife, "the thing that has discouraged me, and almost made me hope that I may die, and the baby die, too, is the thing that you do not see. You are killing yourself. You have reached a point where you cannot live without morphia, and you know without my telling you that you have been increasing the doses every day. It isn't only that you won't be a good doctor; before very long you won't be a good man. The people around here are beginning to notice, and the old minister looked at you very curiously and at me with compassion when he was here yesterday. Let us go somewhere else and try all over again."

Dr. Folsom left the room and went out to fasten his horse to the post. Returning, he sat down by Ethel's side. Looking straight into her eyes, he said, "Ethel, I have made something of a fight, but not enough. I have realized, although I did not like to admit it, that I was getting where I had not very much of a chance, but I have a fighting chance yet, and with you to help me I'll down this thing. We'll fight it together, dear. From this moment no form of morphine, no liquor, shall pass my lips, there shall not be another puncture of the fatal syringe that brings such heavenly ease and calm to tired nerves."

"Don't say 'heavenly,' John," answered Ethel, shuddering. "The word isn't well applied. Yes, we'll fight it together, but with the Lord's help."

The hour that followed was like a sacrament. They sat hand in hand, the wife and the husband, with few words, but with the perfect understanding of two souls that were blending their united strength in a supreme effort of resistance to temptation on the one side and of heroic affection on the other. They knelt together and each audibly prayed, and into their compact there came a third, unseen but not unfelt; and the third, as to the children in the fiery furnace ages ago, was revealed as the Son of man. When Dr. Folsom went out that day to visit his patients he went as a nobler and braver man than he had been before. He had recognized his peril, admitted his sin, confronted the adversary, and accepted his fighting chance.

The promise repeated in Revelation over and over is to him that overcometh. John Folsom strove with God on his side and his wife to cheer him on, and he gained the victory. The shackles fell from his limbs; he became a free man.

From the hour that he made his decision and set his face humbly and reverently toward pure living and the bearing of pain with fortitude, as if by miracle, his health improved. The fight was a hard one, but inch by inch the demon of temptation was routed, and by degrees the man grew stronger, abler for the daily task and finer in every development of his life.

Elsinore gained in importance, and the forest of which it had been so proud in time took on the appearance of a city park. The grand trees were not cut down, and the rhododendrons and honeysuckles were left, but roads intersected the woods and clearings were made at intervals for a better view of the bay and the incoming ships. Dr. Folsom became known in due time as a nerve specialist, and patients sought his sanitarium and the healing he knew how to give.

Children played in his home, the eldest seeming to him always a little more precious than the rest, for he felt as if ere yet that child was born she had been to him as an angel of redemption. Ethel shed few tears except those of joy, as time went on, and her people at home spoke of her husband with deep respect and forgot that they had not promoted the match.

John Folsom, under God, had won a splendid victory when he took his fighting chance.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—SUGAR AS AN ARTICLE OF DIET. Unless a physician forbids sugar as unwholesome in a special case its moderate use is beneficial. To deny sugar to children, and to treat it as if it were obnoxious, is foolish in most cases. Sugar is the one article of diet that keeps sweet in all climates. A ration of sugar is often given to soldiers on the march.

—TO ANNOUNCE AN ENGAGEMENT. Invite your most intimate friends either to luncheon or to afternoon tea, and let your mother or sister announce your engagement when all are assembled. If your friends wish to give you a shower, either of linen or of anything else likely to be useful in married life, they may do so, but you cannot give them a hint on the subject.

20,000 Blankets for Mexico's Sufferers

Shipped by "The Christian Herald," With 100 Sewing Machines, to Our Consul-General at Monterey

LAST week we announced the shipment to Monterey, in the State of Nuevo Leon, Mexico, of 5,000 blankets, the gift of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to the destitute and unsheltered survivors of the great flood which lately caused widespread devastation and suffering in the Southern republic. These blankets were consigned to our Consul-General at Monterey, Hon. Philip C. Hanna, who telegraphs that the first thousand have already been distributed. A few days ago, an appeal came to us from Hidalgo, a Mexican State south of Nuevo Leon, telling of great suffering there also.

Meanwhile, the relief movement begun by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already attained considerable proportions. That our good people in different parts of the country sympathize deeply with their unfortunate neighbors in Mexico is made evident from the following telegram received by our State Department in Washington:

"MONTEREY, MEXICO, October 24.

"Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

"The thousands of blankets from the American Red Cross, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, merchants and private citizens, are arriving and being distributed in Monterey, and sent to outlying towns, affording relief to thousands of delicate women and children in the stricken districts. Scores of bags, bales and boxes of second-hand clothing are arriving from all parts of the United States. Demand very great, and much more will be needed. Corn, beans and rice coming from different parts. Mexicans more fully than ever convinced that Americans are their friends. I have the hearty co-operation of clergy of all denominations and Mexican Red Cross."

Consul-General Hanna adds that 1,000 boxes of clothing, especially heavy garments for women, will be needed. Wells-Fargo Express Company is generously bringing in all packages free, and Mexican National Express distributes them free.

Suggestion having been made that corn be sent in large quantities from this country, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wired Mr. Hanna on the subject. The following was the Consul-General's reply:

"It has grown so much colder since I last telegraphed you that I recommend to your great CHRISTIAN HERALD family that you remain in the blanket business. You have no idea how much comfort those blankets are bringing to the delicate poor, who are without bedding or clothing, these cold days and nights. Besides, no one else but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the Red Cross is sending me blankets, and I have just received notice that 3,000 bushels more of corn, consigned to me, are en route. I now recommend to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family that the money which was going to be spent for corn be expended for more blankets. I will do my best to pull the legs of the farmers in the corn belts of our own glorious country for whatever corn is needed. The one hundred New Home sewing machines, which you are about to send me, will make one hundred new homes self-supporting for many years to come. I recommend that, before shipment, they be marked 'From American Friends.'

Hon. Philip C. Hanna

"PHILIP C. HANNA."

Immediately after the receipt of this urgent telegram 15,000 additional blankets were purchased in New York, and, together with the 100 New Home sewing machines, shipped by the Wells-Fargo Express Company, consigned to Consul Hanna. This makes a total shipment of 20,000 blankets to the Monterey sufferers, sent in the name of the readers of this journal. Every sewing machine has a small plate inserted on the top of the sewing table, bearing the inscription:

> FROM AMERICAN FRIENDS,
> THROUGH THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Before this issue reaches our readers the blankets will have reached Monterey, and thousands of poor Mexican mothers will be gladdened and comforted by these timely gifts at the beginning of the Mexican winter. The sewing machines will also be humming merrily in many poor Mexican homes, where each machine will be the bread-winner and reliance of the household. Fortunately, food is now being received in sufficient quantities to dispel all apprehensions as to suffering from starvation. This is a unique situation in relief work, and it should be a cause for thankfulness that Americans are now pouring in their offerings of foodstuffs with characteristic liberality and promptness.

Our Mission Boat in the Philippines

General View of the Port of Cebu, Philippine Islands, where the "Christian Herald" Mission Boat is Operating

YOU have for several months received no word from us about THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S mission boat. During those months we have been busy, so far as strength made possible, in following up the work through native fellow-workers and through personal effort.

Each place visited last year has this year been showing the fruit of the Gospel work done. The wisdom of visiting the coast villages and giving the converts careful Bible instruction has been manifested in very many instances this year. In and around one of the most spiritually neglected villages of this island God's Spirit has been unceasingly at work through the Gospel since the first native worker entered there. It is the first Cebu village which had seen the mission boat anchored near her shores. When we left there we expected to return soon, but many openings for the work on the other coast, and later the stormy season, which made it too dangerous to go near that treacherous part of the coast, hindered our purpose. In the next largest coast village, Bible instruction had also been given, and through these Christians the work was carried on among many of the far and near villages. Recently, one of their number brought the good news that from around the village which we had left with burdened hearts, and hoping to revisit, there had been an ingathering of from 500 to 600 believers. After months of faithful service in giving the Gospel to their countrymen they are now seeing rich returns. This last number makes one thousand or more believers—probably more than this—in one small village in a scattered portion of this island.

In every place where such changes have been wrought by the Gospel the work can now be readily traced directly to the Bible-instructed Filipino Christians. The large results seen recently have been brought about through the faith-strengthened converts, who, from the time when they first received special Bible instruction, have spread the Gospel with increasing zeal.

Other new places which were opened to the Gospel during the mission boat service of last season now count many converts. In all, we can assure you that God's Spirit has greatly used the gift of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mission boat for a saving work among these people.

After repairs, made necessary partially through months of steady use, the mission boat this year has gone to Bohol, where it is to be used for a time in Dr. and Mrs. Graham's field of labor. So many places there request the Gospel that we expect that the boat will prove to be a great help and comfort. One of the Christian students who has been in training at Dr. Silliman's Institute, at Dumaguette, has now the post of engineer. Some six years ago he came to Cebu City from Bohol Island. He was an orphan, and in search of employment. A Christian meant an image worshiper to him when he reached Cebu; but before long he found the Saviour, and his faithful life since then makes us all rejoice to have him with us in an active and useful capacity.

Thus, in every way, the outlook of usefulness for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mission boat brings us joy, which we long to share with you, and with the many helpers in the gift at home.

Cebu, P. I. ELIZABETH W. JANSEN.

[Contributions in aid of the mission boat, and its work in the Philippines, may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City.]

SEARCH FOR TRUTH AMONG ELIOT RUINS

By JOHN C. HAVEMEYER

NOTWITHSTANDING the great variety of religious beliefs that exist, and the wide differences even in so-called Christian nations, the world is rather startled by the late oracular declaration of Charles W. Eliot, formerly president of Harvard University, that a "New Religion" is about to dawn upon the world, which he calls "the religion of the twentieth century." He speaks either as a prophet, in which case he should confirm his words by adding, "Thus saith the Lord," or by way of suggestion; and in that event his language as quoted, namely: "First, I will tell what this religion will not be; and, second, what it will be," seems wonderfully audacious and conceited; for it must be remembered that he contradicts the belief and experience of many learned and pious men and of a vast additional multitude of intelligent and truthful people.

Moses was a prophet and a divinely appointed leader, whom Mr. Eliot may consider his prototype; although if he does not accept revelation, he may count that part of Bible history as fiction. Whatever may be his opinion, the religious world believes that the Ten Commandments were given on Mount Sinai through Moses, as described in the twentieth chapter of Exodus. These commandments Christ declared he came not to destroy, but to fulfil; and the aim of the Sermon on the Mount is largely to make clear that God requires a heart compliance and not mechanical obedience, and to confirm them by showing their far-reaching significance. Take as an example the sixth commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," which Christ said is violated when a man is angry with his brother without a cause.

What words will fittingly express the astonishment which every thinking man and woman must experience when we recall that Mr. Eliot, and others who insist upon their right and ability to analyze spiritual truth, are breaking the first and second commandments? They are attempting to apply to religion and revelation the same kind of tests or analyses which are used so freely in material things. The first commandment is, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Does this leave any room for a search for another God than the God revealed in the preceding chapters of the Bible and the Being who with such impressiveness spoke to Moses? History, both profane and sacred, and existing monuments show that the most learned and advanced nations in science and art followed Mr. Eliot's example. They tried to find God without revelation. The result was the gods whom the Egyptians, Greeks and Romans worshiped. They tried to invent or make real to themselves the divine Being or Beings who controlled the world, and upon whom they felt they were dependent. The idols they made were simply attempts to put into form the results of their reasoning and imagination. It must be remembered that in these nations were eminent orators, poets and philosophers, and that the samples of art, in the form of temples and other buildings, that survive are still objects of admiration and wonder. It is not to be supposed that they worshiped the materials in these objects of wood and stone, but that these simply represented to them the attributes and characteristics of the gods they thought must exist. How do men who do not accept the God of the Bible differ in his sight from the heathen nations of those days, whose vain attempt in Athens to find out God so stirred the apostle Paul? In addressing them he said:

> Ye men of Athens, . . . as I passed by and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, To the Unknown God. Whom, therefore, ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.

The second commandment forbids the making of graven images to represent anything in heaven, on earth, or in the water under the earth, or bowing down to them. What is the difference between making these images, and bowing down to them and worshiping, and considering as God the creation of our own brain and magination? The tendency of the human mind and heart to do this was wonderfully shown in the golden calf which Aaron, the brother of Moses, set up while Moses was on Mount Sinai receiving the Commandments, because the people were tired of waiting for their leader's return, which resulted in such terrible punishment. We find this tendency and strange violation of these two commandments almost incredibly illustrated in many churches, where a cross or a carved representation of Christ is placed upon the outside, and many other representations of Christ, which are intended only to suggest the divine Being and to aid in his worship, are found inside. We cannot avoid a recognition also of the fact that the same violation of the commandment appears in churches where there are figures of Christ in stained-glass windows. These certainly oppose the repeated assurances of the Master and the apostles that God is a Spirit, and must be worshiped in spirit and in truth, and that spiritual truth is spiritually discerned. "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

Let us now turn to the Harvard Theological Review, to which I have been referred for an authentic report of Mr. Eliot's discourse, and make some extracts, that we may be assured whether Mr. Eliot's "New Religion" contradicts the Bible teaching that "No man by searching can find out God."

1. The New Religion will not be based upon authority, either spiritual or temporal; as a rule, the older churches have relied upon authority.

2. The New Religion will not think of God as an enlarged or glorified man, or as a king or a patriarch.

3. It will believe in no malignant powers, neither in Satan nor in witches.

4. It is not bound to any dogma, creed, book or institution.

5. The New Religion will magnify and laud God's love and compassion, and will not venture what the justice of God may, or may not, require of himself, or of any of his finite creatures.

6. In the future religion there will be nothing supernatural. It will place no reliance on any sort of magic, or miracle, or other violation of, or exception to, the laws of nature.

7. In his moral attributes he is for every man the multiplication to infinity of all the noblest, tenderest and most potent qualities which that man has ever seen or imagined in a human being.

8. In this sense every man makes his own picture of God. Every age, barbarous or civilized, happy or unhappy, improving or degenerating, frames its own conception of God, within the limits of its own experiences and imaginings.

Search for Truth

Throughout this teaching we learn it is man's right, ability and duty to find out God; human reason and imaginings are sufficient, and there can be no God who, in attributes or action, opposes his own conception.

Strangely enough, the "New Religion" will be based on the two great commandments of loving God and one's neighbor, and Dr. Eliot thinks that it will make Christ's revelation seem more wonderful than ever. Still it rejects truth which Christ declares to be fundamental, as when he says:

> Whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock. . . . And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand.

Christ claimed that he came from the Father, and would go to the Father. If any part of Christ's teaching is authentic and should guide us, it certainly follows that nothing can be excluded. But Dr. Eliot does not accept this self-evident truth, for Christ told Peter that "Satan hath desired to have thee, that he may sift you as wheat," and was himself tempted by the devil, and the record is given even of the language used both by himself and the devil; and his warning was to his disciples, "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation."

Dr. Eliot appears to exclude prayer, but in the prayer which Christ taught there was that far-reaching petition, which he certainly would not have commanded unless it were needful, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." And yet how opposed to human reason is the command to ask God that he will exert an influence which will lead men to do his will in the perfect way it is done in heaven.

A wonderful reproof is given by Christ to those who insist upon having a god of their own creation in the fact that, though we are told that "without him was not anything made that was made," and that he "came from God and went to God," he did not give any explanation concerning this world or the world to come. Clearly it was not the divine plan that men should know what Dr. Eliot says they may know. Christ's revelation was of God's love and his attitude or feeling toward us, and what should be ours toward him and the kind of life he requires. For instance, to teach us the mutual relation and give us ground for faith and trust, he said:

> Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are numbered. Fear ye not, therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows.

And this teaching is ample foundation, not only for trust in God, but to show that there is in God the personal knowledge and control of everything that happens in the world.

Strangely, our new prophet says the "New Religion" accepts literally St. Paul's statement, "In Him we live and move and have our being." Can he, then, consistently reject other things that Paul taught? He declared that for him to live was Christ, and that he had resolved to know nothing among men but Jesus Christ and him crucified, and that without faith it is impossible to please God; for we must believe that he is and is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him, and that whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, we are to do all to the glory of God.

What a curious product or excrescence of the twentieth century our friend is! May we not justly consider him to be of the class against whom Jeremiah warns:

> Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Hearken not unto the words of the prophets that prophesy unto you; they make you vain: they speak a vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord.

How we Discovered the Picture which Illustrates Our Exceptionally Attractive Calendar for 1910. Our 1910 "Dreamland" Calendar is a PHOTOGRAVURE (not simply black and white), and measures 18 x 21 inches.

WHILE in Europe last May on his way to an audience with His Majesty Victor Emmanuel III., King of Italy, Dr. Louis Klopsch, Editor of The Christian Herald, discovered a picture entitled "Dreamland," practically unknown in America, but greatly admired in European art circles. It was painted by Prof. F. Charderon, the famous French artist, and at once attracted the attention of art connoisseurs. The beauty of this veritable masterpiece so impressed Dr. Klopsch that he immediately decided to arrange, if possible, for its reproduction in this country. This, after months of delay, was finally accomplished.

The large and superb Photogravure reproduction, all ready for framing, which embellishes our Calendar, is more than excellent. While the subject itself is one of rare beauty, its striking attractiveness is greatly enhanced by the soft richness, velvet texture and mellow tint, which find charming expression in this Splendid Achievement of the Engraver's Art. The above Miniature reproduction in black and white cannot give more than a vague idea of the Beautiful Picture which adorns our 1910 Calendar. This Calendar measures 18 x 21 inches, and wherever displayed will at once attract the eye of every Art Lover, and all who have any appreciation for genuine beauty.

A Feature of the "DREAMLAND" Calendar is the Legibility of the Dates, which are Large and Clear

Paul's Story of His Life

By Mrs. M. Baxter

PAUL was a Jew, born in Tarsus, a city in Cilicia [Asia Minor], but brought up in Jerusalem, at the feet of Gamaliel, headmaster of a school much in reputation there. There he was "taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and was zealous toward God" (Acts 22:3). His religious convictions also: "as touching the law a Pharisee" (Phil. 3:5). He was conscientious in his persecution of Christians: "I verily thought with myself," he says (Acts 26:9), "that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth, which thing I also did in Jerusalem: and many of the saints did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests; and when they were put to death I gave my voice against them." But in Tim. 1:12, 13, we see how deeply he was afterwards humbled about this.

Then came his conversion; the wondrous change, when his blind eyes were open with the eyes of his heart, and it was revealed to him that his surrender was accepted, that his vocation would be to "suffer great things" for Him whom he had blasphemed and persecuted.

All the Christians of his day suffered. "I am more" (i. e., more abundant in suffering); "in labors more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft." In Acts 16 we have a sample of the stripes and the prison, but this is only one ordeal of the many similar ones which he underwent. "Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one," the limit permitted by the law (Deut. 25:3), but of neither of these do we hear in the Acts of the Apostles. "Thrice was I beaten with rods." Acts 16:22 accounts for only one of these occasions. "Once was I stoned"—i. e., at Lystra (Acts 14:19). "Thrice I suffered shipwreck"; again no mention in his evangelistic journeys in the book of Acts, for the shipwreck of Acts 27 was several years after this Epistle was written; as also, "A day and a night have I been in the deep."

And now follows a general description of his life: "In journeyings often," no settling down for a comfortable life in a settled sphere of service, he was always at the disposal of his Lord, and neither sought nor would have a choice of his own. And now a list of all kinds of dangers: "In perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren." And then his actual sufferings: "In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often"—perhaps often from sheer want of food—"in cold and nakedness." And then that which most weighed in this life of living sacrifice: "Beside those things which are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches."

Still continuing the defense of his apostleship, to which the criticising legal and opposing Jews had driven him, he comes to that wonderful experience mentioned in II. Cor. 12, prefacing it by the words, "It is not expedient for me doubtless to glory. I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord. I knew [or know] a man in Christ"—evidently alluding to himself (verses 6, 7)—"above fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth); such an one caught up to the third heaven. And I knew such a man (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth); how that he was caught up into Paradise, and heard unspeakable words which it is not lawful [allowed to man] to utter." Was it during this time of revelation that the mystery of the body of Christ, which had been hid from ages and generations, was made known to him?

LOST IN THE ROCKIES

By E. RYERSON YOUNG, JR.

"WHAT is the matter, Dr. Davidson? We have done what we could for you, and yet you seem displeased," said the president of the club, a little testily. He had been the principal one in bringing the old explorer and scientist to the club and in arranging the little celebration, so he was anxious that it should be thoroughly appreciated.

"You are very kind in your actions toward me," said Dr. Davidson, "but the flippant words of many men here have touched a tender spot in me, and I cannot feel pleasant while they are allowed to have their way unreproved."

"To what do you refer?"

"If you do not understand to what I refer, just take this seat beside me and listen."

The president did so, and, while apparently chatting with "the lion of the evening," he overheard a group of men laughing and talking somewhat boisterously over the methods of Christianity, by which it endeavors to propagate its truth—its Bible Societies and missionary projects.

"Well, what of that?" said the president. "Is not what they say true?"

"True!" said the old explorer, in a voice that had ominous thunder in it; "true that some men of science are not men of sense. But tell those men to sit down a few minutes, and I'll tell them why I can't enjoy their jokes and why I believe in the 'penny-pickers' and 'the tract distributors,' and in all that kind of work."

"We don't want any preaching here," said the president.

"You don't?" thundered the old man. "Sit down, men. I want to tell you a story of my early days."

"It may seem a light thing," he began, "for you who enjoy the temporal fruits of Christianity, its peace and prosperity, its liberty and kindly toleration, with ten thousand solid blessings that go with these, to sneer at the power which is the source of it all; but if you had had a glimpse into the primal human passions, as I have had, and then received kindness at the hands of transformed savages, you would be made to realize the power of God unto salvation in a way that ought to break the petrified heart of any paleozoic mummy.

"Thirty years ago I wanted to do some exploring in the Rocky Mountains. My journey over the Rockies was full enough of adventures; but it is of the return journey I wish to tell you more particularly.

"I started back, with two guides and four pack-horses. We got along splendidly for some days; and then, when we were about half-way over, a series of disasters beset us. First, two horses fell over a precipice, and one of the guides lost his life in trying to recover them. Then the other guide took sick, and, after untold suffering for both of us, but especially for him, poor fellow, he died. I tried to make my way alone, but I lost the trail amidst the many ravines. The other horses I had played out. One died and the other fell down a deep ravine, carrying with it the last food and weapons I had, except a revolver.

"For days I wandered on over the mountains, subsisting on what my revolver brought me. Then its ammunition failed, and I lived on roots and the inner bark of trees. Two weeks passed since I had tasted any animal food. Emaciated and on my last legs, as it were, I crawled around a mountain precipice, and, to my great delight, the plains burst upon my sight! There, in the clear sunlight, stretched away, like a thin white line, the well-beaten trail to Edmonton.

"But I saw smoke! I crawled down the rock cautiously. There on the other side of the ravine, right between me and the prairie trail, was an encampment of Indians! My last experience with Indians of the plain did not make this a welcome sight, and my soul revolted with horror. It seemed that I had escaped the rigors and perils of the mountains only to fall into the hands of murderous Indians. To go back was death. To go forward seemed to be death also. I was weak unto fainting, but a desperate resolve came to me. I said that I would cautiously get down the mountain side, hide behind some boulders until night came, and then run through the encampment and out onto the trail.

"After much effort and suffering—for every move meant agony—I reached a good hiding-place. I lay down and almost fainted from weakness. I chewed a few pieces of bark to try to get some nutrition and quiet the gnawing and fever of my stomach, but it seemed in vain.

"The night began to close around, and the Indian campfires glowed brightly. I crouched more closely to my hiding-place. I thought that I would die there from faintness. Then I heard a sweet sound. It startled me at first, for my reason seemed to say that no such music was in keeping with such wilds and my Indian neighbors. I thought, for the moment, my mind had turned. But the music continued, and through the quiet twilight came the melody of Bishop Ken's evening hymn. To assure myself, I cautiously crawled to the edge of the rock that closed in my hiding-place and peered out at those Indians.

"There they all were—men, women and children—gathered around one of their campfires, in a most decorous way, singing that grand old hymn. When the hymn ceased, the whole company kneeled down on the ground, with heads bowed, all save one. This man, with upturned countenance and clasped hands, led them in a fervent prayer.

"A revulsion of feeling swept over me. Fear left me, and I said to myself, 'I am safe—safe! I can trust myself to any one who can sing that hymn, and pray to my mother's God.'

"I staggered to my feet, but my legs refused to carry me, and with a cry I fainted and fell.

"When I regained consciousness I was in a large wigwam, with several Indians around me. They gave me soothing decoctions, nursed and fed me for five long weeks. My agonies were almost indescribable. I raved and fought a good part of the time. But they stayed with me, cared for me, and put me on my feet again. For simple, consistent Christian life, commend me to the Stoney Indians of the foothills of the Rocky Mountains.

"After the fever abated, I quickly regained my strength in that glorious atmosphere. When I determined to push on, they loaned me horses and sent three of their number two hundred miles with me to Edmonton, the nearest habitation then of white men.

"Poor, emaciated, stripped of all that I had, without the least hope of remuneration, the converted savages thus cared for me and brought me again to the bosom of my own kin. Tell me, men, where I would have been this night, had not a 'penny-sent' missionary met those Indians ere I had?"

"I beg your pardon, doctor, for my words," said one of the members, in a voice of deep emotion, as he stepped up and took the doctor's hand.

"Rather, my friend," said the doctor graciously, "ask God's pardon. The springs of his power seem often hidden to our eyes and the outlets lowly. He chooseth the weak things of earth to confound the mighty."

Mrs. C. P., Dunrea, Manitoba, Canada. Please tell me how to make plain, home-made frames for my art gallery. They must be simple and inexpensive.

"Passe-partout-ing" is the simplest way of framing pictures. Lay your picture, having obtained a piece of glass to fit it, on a strong piece of pasteboard or thick paper. Then paste firmly all around it, keeping the edges even on the glass, a narrow border of any strong fabric, as denim or linen. Then turn it over and paste the other edge upon the back side, where it need not be so even, but should adhere well. Be careful in adjusting the corners. Or get smooth, turned pieces of wood. Paste some quiet chintz smoothly upon them. Cut them to fit your picture, glueing the corners together. The book Home Needlework should be in your public library, and tells how to make raffia and other frames. Rustic frames, made of sticks with the bark upon them, can be constructed so as to be truly artistic. Also, plain, smooth sticks can have birch-bark pasted upon them, and can then be made into frames. Whatever you frame, a strong lining of pasteboard, or thin scantling, should back your picture.

C. H. B., 752 Broad Street, Newark, N. J. Please suggest a suitable name for a Young People's Society (all of them Christians), in an evangelical church.

The following are suggested: 1. Soldiers of Conscience (from Wordsworth). 2. The Truth Seekers (or Soldiers of Truth). 3. The Right Forward Club (or League). 4. The Hold-Fast League (Heb. 10:23). 5. The League of the Shining Light (Prov. 4:18). 6. The Order of Leaveners (I. Cor. 5:6 and Gal. 4:9). 7. Followers of the Vision (Prov. 29:18). 8. Order of the Friendly Counselors or the Friendly Counsel League (Prov. 27:9). 9. The Order of the Golden Apple (Prov. 25:11). 10. The Fellowship of the Mystery (Eph. 3:9). 11. The Hand, Head and Heart League. If a motto is desired, a good one is "Live pure, speak true, right wrong and follow the King" (from Tennyson's "Gareth and Lynette").

H. C. G., London, Ontario. Should I say to a friend, "I go to hear Dr. So-and-So to-night; shall you go with me?" or should I say, "You shall go with me"?

The first is an invitation, the second is a command. It depends on which of the two you wish to express.

V. S., MacN., Pasadena, Tex. How is the name of the great Norwegian poet, Bjornstjerne Bjornson pronounced?

"Byurn-styerna Byurn-son."

A. W., Bridgeport, Conn. 1. Give a clear definition of tensile strength. 2. What is the tensile strength of steel?

Tensile strength is the resistance to separation of the particles or fibres of a body. It is proportional to their number, or the area of its transverse section. Various steels have different strength: Tool-steel, 179,980 pounds; cast-steel, 142,000; razor-steel, 150,000.

R. A. D., Indiana. How could Cook or Peary have known when they reached the location of the North Pole? How are measurements taken, and by what?

This query was referred to Professor Samuel Phelps Leland, who answers as follows: Measurements of latitude and longitude are usually made by the use of a chronometer clock, or watch (which must indicate the exact time of the day), a sextant, a theodolite and a mercurial horizon. These constitute the simplest outfit. The altitude of the sun must be obtained, and the horizontal horizon must be fixed, and the exact time when the observation is made must be taken into account. From these lines and time the angles are easily worked out. The results are mathematical. Is It possible to determine when the observer is at the precise pole? Probably not. If he were within 25 or 50 miles of it, his error might not be discoverable.

THE ANCIENT CASTLE OF CHAPULTEPEC

PROBABLY the most interesting structure in all Mexico to the American tourist is the grim old castle of Chapultepec, which crowns a lofty hill not far from the City of Mexico. The hill has been fortified for centuries and was one of the residences of the great native Emperor Montezuma. There is a passage inside, leading to the top of the rock, up which Montezuma used to pass and then appear as if by a miracle on the crest, much to the awe of his Aztec subjects below. The castle was added to, if not founded by, the Spaniards, and is now the seat of the Mexican Military Academy. It played an important part in the Mexican War, and was the last fortification to fall before the capital city was taken. It was bombarded and then the Americans carried it by storm. The view from the castle is of surpassing beauty.

Reader, Louisville, Ky. How many libraries has Andrew Carnegie given away?

The last report, given out at the close of last year, shows that he had given about 1,700 library buildings in the United States and abroad.

E. T., Winchester, O. 1. When was the Christian Union Church first established? 2. Will ministers of the Christian Union Church baptize infants?

1. Established in Columbus, O., 1863, and fully organized two years later. It declares for unity of the church; Christ the Head; Bible, sole rule of faith and practice; good fruits; avoid controversy; self-government in each church; baptism; open communion. 2. Nothing stated as to infant baptism.

Miss E. M., Chicago, Ill. What is the present population of the six largest cities in the world?

London, 7,450,000; New York, 4,565,000; Paris, 2,792,000; Chicago, 2,225,000; Berlin, 2,164,000; Vienna, 2,100,000. New York is increasing with greater rapidity than any of the others, and promises to ultimately outstrip its rivals.

Mrs. E. K., Georgia. How is Delhi, the name of the city in India, pronounced?

It is pronounced Del-lee.

Old Subscriber, Toronto, Canada. 1. How long since Ireland and Scotland had Parliaments of their own? 2. From what language does the word "parliament" come?

1. The Irish Parliament met for the last time on August 2, 1800. The Act of Union having passed, Ireland thereafter sent members to Westminster, to sit in the British Parliament. The Scottish Parliament met for the last time on April 22, 1707. The Act of Union was passed on January 16, 1707. 2. The word "parliament" comes from the French parlement, a speech or discourse.

B. G. R., Wilmington, Del. What is the Christmas Rose?

It is a plant known scientifically as genus helleborus. The flower is of much beauty. It blossoms in the late winter and early spring. The best is known as the Old Christmas Rose. The flowers are white, and about three inches in diameter.

M. A. F., Harrisburg, Pa. What is sidereal time?

It is the time required for the earth to rotate on its axis. The sidereal day is the interval between two passages of a star across the meridian. This is divided into 24 sidereal hours of 60 sidereal minutes each. Any good astronomy will give full information.

J. T. B., Philadelphia, Pa. 1. Kindly advise the number of missions in New York City which are devoted more especially to lead the Jewish people to God's only way to salvation. 2. What have been the results for, say, the last five years? 3. In the face of millions upon millions of Christians having found the true Christ, upon what conditions do the Intelligent Jews of to-day base the hope for eternal life, while rejecting God's Ambassador, who came to save them, and since there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved?

The foregoing was submitted to Rev. A. F. Schauffler, who is president of the New York Hebrew Christian Mission, whose superintendent, Rev. Bernhard Angel, is particularly well informed on the subject. Mr. Angel replied as follows: "1. The New York City Mission and Tract Society has a Jewish branch, and employs a Jewish missionary, who also is superintendent of the Jewish reading room on Seventh Street. The Methodist Episcopal City Mission and the Lutheran Synod each also employs a Jewish missionary. 2. No statistics are available concerning the results in conversions from Judaism in New York City. No definite number of converts could be given, since there are those who, on account of persecution, leave the city when they become believers, and confess Christ elsewhere. Then there are many who, perhaps at the request of an aged parent, for the time being remain secret believers. 3. The Jew, orthodox or reform, has no assurance of forgiveness of sins, even when obeying the teaching of the rabbis that 'prayer, charity and repentance—these three—avert the impending doom' (Ta 'anit ii, 656). The rabbis also teach that Israel is among the ten who are called living; that is, possess eternal life, in allusion to Deut. 4:4. Yet the Talmud tells the story of the famous rabbi, Johanan ben Zachai, who, on his deathbed, wept bitterly and told his disciples he did not know whether he was on the way to receive eternal life or eternal punishment. The Jew finds himself in this 'darkness of Judaism,' since he bases his hope of eternal life on his own merit, instead of 'being justified by faith.' A peculiar passage in the prayer which the orthodox Jew recites on the eve of the Sabbath reads thus: 'Through the son of Jesse, the Bethlehemite, redemption has come to my soul.' Best of all, in these days, many a Jew is ready to confess:

" 'My hope is built on nothing less Than Jesus' blood and righteousness.' "

M. M., Los Angeles, Calif. What are the ten largest cities in the United States, in their order?

New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston, Baltimore, Cleveland, Buffalo, San Francisco, Cincinnati.

L. O. F., Richmond, Va. What is the origin of the term "pidgin," or "pigeon English," often used in the writings of missionaries in the East?

It is a jargon made up from English-Portuguese words, used according to the Chinese idiom and employed in commercial transactions with the Chinese. Pidgin, or pigeon, is a corruption of the English word "business," getting to its corrupt form as follows: bidginess, bidgin, pidgin or pigeon.

H. P., Sunderland, Mass. Did people in classic times use the mile in measurements of distance?

Both the Greeks and Romans had a measurement which we translate as a mile. It was shorter, however, than the English mile. The Roman mile was 4,835 feet; the Greek, 4,030 feet.

Miscellaneous

Reader, Sandusky, O. The grain crop this year is estimated at 3,000,000,000 bushels, the greatest ever known. At 50 cents a bushel, they will be worth $1,500,000,000 to the farmers.

W. J. W. C., Santa Maria, Calif. 1. The term "elect" was applied (a) to the whole body of baptized Christians, (b) to the highest class of catechumens elected to, or set apart for, baptism, and (c) at other times to the newly baptized. 2. Every true believer in Christ, who does his will and follows his precepts, is entitled to be regarded as a Christian.

F. F. F., Oshkosh, Wis. The Scripture teaches both temperance and abstinence. It tells us to do nothing whereby our brother might be offended or that would cause him to stumble (see Rom., 14 chapter). Whatsoever God does is perfect. No gift ever came from his hands that would injure the human race, or unseat man's reason, or efface the divine image and replace it with the stamp of the brute.

G. F. L., London, Ky. The claim that speaking in tongues is conclusive evidence that the speaker is filled with the Holy Spirit is not accepted by a majority of modern theologians. While recognizing the Omnipotent power which is able to reproduce to-day the wonders of apostolic times, it is generally laid down as a rule that the test of genuineness in "the tongues" shall be a twofold one, viz.: (1) Capable of interpretation, and (2) in the line of some high spiritual purpose. Failing either or both of these, it would be a question whether it were indeed the gift of tongues or of confusion. The Lord never does anything in vain, and when he has a message to give to his children he either has an interpreter at hand or the message interprets itself.

Hannah Elizabeth Fabens

In writing concerning our Great "Dreamland" Calendar, says:

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD "Dreamland" Calendar for 1910 is a veritable gem. As a photogravure it is simply unsurpassed. The light and shade are admirable, throwing the childish figure into bold relief. One can almost hear the soft, deep breathing of the little sleeper, lying in the peaceful abandonment of innocence. The uptilted chin, the beautifully rounded arms thrown carelessly out, the charmingly dimpled hands, one half-closed, each gives its own suggestion of infantile grace. "Dreamland" is a picture that cannot be seen without being coveted. The first person who saw my proof exclaimed, 'Oh, the dear darling! Give me that for my Christmas present!' "

Our "Dreamland" Calendar measures 18 x 21 inches, and is sent uncreased, all charges prepaid. Undamaged delivery guaranteed.

The White Prophet*

IN spite of the power which Mr. Hall Caine undeniably possesses, he has an irritating habit of fixing upon themes which are a trifle too large for him.

This is somewhat painfully evident in his latest book. He has studied the setting of his story thoroughly. The Englishman in Egypt is sketched vividly. There is "atmosphere" and vitality.

But the plot, complicated, impossible, almost inconceivable, is made anything but convincing. A young man, who is described as the "soul of honor," appears to us repeatedly in anything but an honorable position; and a young woman of "delicacy and refinement" writes letters so vulgar and slangy as to verge upon the disgusting.

As for the White Prophet himself, he starts out as an almost sublime conception. The reader instinctively expects him to move through the world like those characters in modern dramas who have simply to enter a house to have all confusion and vice and hate vanish. Ishmael Ameer betrays many human weaknesses, and the expectation is not realized. Still, he moves out majestically at the end, and his picture lies not unpleasantly in the memory. As for the sense of profanation which some sensitive readers have expressed in print—doubtless suggested by the rather impious motto on the title-page of the book, "I know that my Redeemer liveth"—the feeling that Mr. Caine has irreverently attempted to portray the character of Christ in this Moslem fanatic—it must seem to the normal mind rather farfetched and invidious.

The book holds the interest from beginning to end by its highly melodramatic succession of startling incidents; but as a work of art it is sadly disappointing. Passages of great beauty and several masterly descriptions are to be found in it; but the author's love for straining the reader's suspense long past "the breaking point," and his weakness for salacious detail and suggestion have been sadly overdone in The White Prophet. They have served to lend an air of cant to much of the religious rhapsody in which the book abounds, and to make its admirable ideals and maxims seem often forced and meretricious.

A Book Worth While

DR. FRANCIS TREVELYAN MILLER, editor-in-chief of The Journal of American History and literary editor of The Searchlight Library, who prepared for us our New Premium Book, entitled Hero Tales from American Life, commenting on the work, writes as follows:

"This volume comprises one hundred tales of daring and heroism from the thousands of episodes in American life and history, selected for elements of dramatic interest. It will entrance and thrill the reader. While composed primarily of stories of tragic tests of courage, it is frequently of historical significance. This volume of narratives will attain wide popularity. It will undoubtedly be treasured as the most readable book in the home. It is, moreover, one of those rare volumes which the reader can take up at any moment and always find a few lines that will cause the heart to throb and impress themselves indelibly on the memory.

"It is a volume that can be read for years and never be found wearisome—one of those inspirational books that can be read anywhere and at any time—backwards as well as forwards—a volume that becomes an intimate and beloved friend."

This describes the splendid book, Hero Tales from American Life, which is one of our leading Premium Propositions for the present season.

"Hero Tales from American Life." Four hundred pages, large type, richly illustrated and beautifully bound in Turkey Red and Gold; our Superb "Dreamland" Calendar and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week for one whole year—all three for only $2.

The Moslem World. By Samuel M. Zwemer, F.R.G.S., sixteen years a missionary in Arabia. New York: Young People's Missionary Movement of the United States and Canada. 50 cents. A valuable book for all who are studying Mohammedanism in any of its phases. Its small size makes it a convenient reference book, yet it is wonderfully comprehensive.

The Psychic Riddle. By Isaac K. Funk, D.D., LL.D., editor-in-chief of the Standard Dictionary. Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York. $1. Interesting accounts of strange psychic phenomena and mysterious events. The abnormal, the sub-normal and the super-normal are abundantly exploited in these pages, and one rises from their perusal somewhat confused as to the real and the unreal.

Great Hymns of the Middle Ages. Compiled by Eveline Warner Brainerd. This volume of the Thumb-Nail Series contains translations of hymns mainly taken from the older Latin forms. With a few exceptions the poems in the present collection are given entire, but many of the best must be abridged for use in hymn-books. Leather covers; gilt edges. Frontispiece. Pp. 122. Price $1. The Century Company, publishers, New York.

Justice to the Jew: The Story of What He Has Done for the World. New and revised edition by Rev. Madison C. Peters, who writes in his preface: "If what is written in this book will essentially modify the views which the Gentile world holds with regard to the position of the Jew, and will lead Christians to grant to him the possession of the mental, moral and spiritual qualities which history affirms, and if every Jew can be made to feel as Lord Beaconsfield felt, then Benjamin Disraeli, when taunted in the House of Commons for his Jewish extraction, and when he hurled back, 'I can well afford to be called a Jew,' the author shall feel he is well repaid for the labor involved in this refined study of history." Cloth covers. Pp. 244. Price 75 cents. McClure Company, New York.

The Epistle to the Hebrews. By Edgar J. Goodspeed. Acts, The Second Volume of Luke's Work on the Beginnings of Christianity, with interpretative comment. By George Holley Gilbert, Ph.D., D.D. The above two volumes are in The Bible for Home and School series, Shailer Mathews, general editor. They are intended to place the results of the best modern Biblical scholarship at the disposal of the general reader. Cloth binding. Price of first volume is 50 cents. Pp. 132. The price of the latter is 75 cents. Pp. 267. Lesson Stories for the Kindergarten Grades of the Bible School. Grade A; General Subject: God the Workman. By Lois Sedgwick Palmer, Kindergartner; Outline by Professor George William Pease. Cloth covers. Pp. 127. Price 75 cents. The above three books are published by the Macmillan Company, New York.

The White Prophet.* A Novel. By Hall Caine, author of The Manxman, The Deemster, The Christian, The Eternal City, The Prodigal Son, etc. Illustrations by R. Caton Woodville. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

The Grace of Thankfulness*

IT is said to be a psychological fact that impressions of pleasure linger far longer in the memory than impressions of pain; but it is certainly true that, as the experiences of every day pass, the troubles and perplexities loom far greater than the blessings in the minds of most people.

This is all wrong. We ought to be counting up our mercies daily. But it may be readily seen why we err in the other direction. The terrible dilemmas and catastrophies which so often confront us demand instant attention. Maybe you can mitigate or ward off an impending calamity. Maybe, by some ingenious move you may succeed in capturing a benefit which now seems to be slipping from your grasp.

Under these circumstances the most deep and constant thought is demanded. Everything else must be excluded from the consciousness. Our great Judge will surely take into consideration the weakness of our flesh when our cases come before him; but, "after all is said and done," the fact remains that not one of us thanks God half as often nor half as heartily as he ought. Gratitude is a distinguishing mark of a noble soul, and, alas! few of us have truly noble souls.

It has become a custom during recent time, in many parts of our country, to make Thanksgiving Day an occasion for the discussion of national issues in the churches. This is generally acceptable. No doubt waves of protest at political wrongdoing have been started in such discussions, which have widened until they have led to great national upheavals.

Just now there is abundant occasion for thankfulness in this direction. "Graft" is still filching vast sums from our city treasuries. In many sections, bad men still hold the balance of power. But we have at the head of our government a fearless, able and conscientious man, respected by all parties, and desirous of healing all sectional strife.

He has gathered around him a cabinet of honest and thoughtful men. All this is cause for supreme thankfulness.

Our Congress is still largely under the control of the great monopolies; but we can see on every side signs of a profound determination on the part of the people to regain their supremacy. Our magazines and newspapers are relentlessly exposing the inner workings of the trusts. Laws are forming to limit and control them. It seems likely that a new generation will see them shorn of their power. For this prospect of relief let us be thankful.

Some one has said that we have laws enough to give us a perfect government, if they could only be administered by pure and intelligent men. After all, it is "the man behind the gun" that determines the result.

"It is criminal," says Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst, "to encourage the candidacy of any man for any office who cannot be trusted to work along the plumbline of what is everlastingly just and holy." And of the rest of us, who are not office-holders, he says, "The prime responsibility for crime rests upon the respectable and even the church-going element in the community, who are not made so righteously wrathful by the administration's tolerance of iniquity as to render it impossible. It is not the statutes that are on the book; it is the amount of passionate moral purpose that the decent people put into the statutes that determines their enforcement."

Christian patriotism! Let us desire and cultivate it; and that there is so much of it among us let us at this Thanksgiving time be truly grateful.

Bringing in the Guests*

THERE are few Christians who have not at times upbraided themselves for their failure to win souls for Christ. We are his ministers. The humblest of us represents him. His feast is spread. Each of us is a messenger to summon the guests, yet most of us bring in few, if any.

Some years ago, in a beautiful town in the Middle West, a man of good social position gave a party. His wife's family also ranked among the foremost in the place.

Some scandal had arisen concerning the grown children of this excellent couple, though they themselves knew nothing of it; and the young people, who were really not bad but merely wilful and wild, had no idea that they had outraged the community's sense of propriety until they gave this entertainment, to which hundreds were invited, but only six came.

Their large and handsomely furnished home was decorated lavishly for the occasion, and an elegant collation was prepared. Lights shone through every window, but they shone upon empty rooms.

It was a bitter experience. Scarcely one more mortifying could occur. And yet we place our Master in a similar position so long as we do not partake of his feast and bring with us, so far as we are able, the other guests whom he has invited, but who may be heedless of his call.

The old monastic system, which we are wont to condemn, was in its beginning a noble response to this invitation. The early monks felt that the feast of God was to be taken properly only in poverty, labor, the resignation forever of the joys of family life, and the devotion of their order to the service of the sick and suffering.

Their lofty ideals and humble faith touched the heart of the world. The great, either in admiration for their virtue, or in penance for sin, poured untold wealth at their feet.

"Then," writes James Peile, "the societies which had thriven under poverty and hardship, sank under the weight of prosperity into decrepitude and uselessness. Serfs toiled for them, while the monks passed their time in day-long idleness, the fruitful parent of vice."

They had turned away from the Master's table to eat the husks of the swine, and all their formal repetitions but disgusted and repelled the guests whom they had brought in by the thousand to the heavenly banquet in the days of their purity and innocence.

We eat the feast and drink the cup, and the Spirit of the Christ will do the rest. Then,

> What is left for us, save, in growth
> Of soul, to rise up, far past both,
> From the gift looking to the giver,
> And from the cistern to the river,
> And from the finite to infinity,
> And from man's dust to God's divinity?

Thus we may go forth to speak to others of the strength and joy which we gain there.

We have no business to neglect the invitation of our Master; but quite as important as our own presence there is that of the individuals about us, every one of whom has also his loving summons. It is our privilege and duty to extend this invitation to those who seem unconscious or indifferent. You may not always be able to speak directly to them upon the subject. It may be that only by your example, and by a friendly and loving deportment, you can touch them. But see to it that all that you can do is done. If you can help it, do not let your Master's feast be slighted, as his Messiahship was slighted by the Jews of old.

A Book of Facts About 6% Irrigation Bonds

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds, based on 15 years of experience. It is a conservative statement of the vital facts of which we have intimate knowledge.

It will give you a clear conception of these ideal securities, which are now the most popular bonds that we handle.

Every investor, small or large, owes to himself a knowledge of these facts. Please send for the book—it is free.

An Unbiased Book

We are very large dealers in all good classes of bonds—Municipal, Corporation and Public Utility. We can offer you the choice of scores of such issues, and we just as gladly supply them as we do Irrigation bonds. So our position is not at all biased.

But Irrigation bonds have in late years become the most popular bonds that we handle. They are becoming more popular as they become better known. The reasons mean much to every investor, and they are all told in this book.

71 Issues Sold

In the past 15 years we have sold 71 separate issues of Reclamation bonds—Drainage and Irrigation—without a dollar of loss to any investor. We are now the largest dealers in this class of bonds, so our book is based on ample experience.

We buy and sell Entire Issues of Reclamation bonds. Our own engineers and attorneys pass on every detail. An officer of our Company spends most of his time in the irrigated country, watching every project through to completion.

Being the largest dealers in Irrigation bonds, we have our pick of the issues. There are few projects of this kind, save Government projects, which we are not invited to finance. We are able, therefore, to supply our customers with the best of these securities, all based on well-located lands.

Farm Lien Security

Irrigation bonds are secured by first liens on the most fertile farm lands in America. The liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. And the water immediately multiplies the land's value.

The liens are conservative. Usually they will not exceed one-fourth the land's value. The liens are paid off in ten annual installments.

The first crop from the land is frequently sufficient to pay the whole lien—often by several times over. These liens, therefore, have many advantages over the usual farm mortgage.

(5.)

In addition, the bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns, and which the proceeds of the bonds help to build and buy.

Some Irrigation bonds are municipal securities, issued by organized districts. Such bonds, like School bonds, form a tax lien on all the real property lying in populous districts.

Some Irrigation bonds are issued under all the provisions of the Federal law known as the "Carey Act."

In all the projects we finance the security is ample and ideal. One can scarcely conceive of anything better.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent. interest. This is a larger rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

This high rate is due to the fact that irrigation projects are profitable. The demand for irrigated land exceeds the supply. Many millions of dollars can be utilized at once in these projects, and this liberal rate is paid to obtain the funds.

$100—$500—$1,000

These are serial bonds, running from two to twelve years. So one may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

The bonds are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

Have You Confidence in the Matron of the Christian Herald Children's Home?

Of course you have. The Home was built with contributions of Christian Herald readers and its great success is largely due to the wise forethought and broadminded economics practiced by its matron, Mrs. Hopkins. This fact will make doubly interesting a letter which we received from her recently. Here it is word for word as she wrote it.

The 1900 Washer Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN:—We have used your washing machine at The Christian Herald Children's Home with great satisfaction. It saves time, labor and clothing, as its construction renders the cleansing process much easier and less wearing upon fabrics than the old manner of rubbing upon a wash-board. It is the best washer we have ever used at the "Home." Yours truly, (Signed) M. S. HOPKINS, Supt.

Watch the Woman!

Do you think she is really working? Not a bit of it! Yet she is doing a big week's washing. The real work is done by the 1900 Gravity Washer, which makes most of its own motion. The thing that helps to make it go is under the tub.

If women knew what a wonderful help the 1900 Gravity Washer is, not one would be without it. It saves work and worry and doctors' bills. Takes away all the dread and drudgery of wash day. It saves soap, saves wear and tear on the clothes. Never breaks buttons or injures the most delicate fabrics. It certainly does beautiful work.

Send No Money!

The Washer Pays for Itself

We ask no cash in advance—no deposit—no notes. The trial is absolutely free. If you keep it, simply pay us a little each week or each month, out of what it saves for you.

If, after a full month's free trial, you decide not to keep it, simply notify us to send for it. We will take it back without a word of complaint. The trial will not cost you a penny and will not place you under the slightest obligation

How to Wash Without Work

Write for Free Book about the Wonderful Washer that Almost Runs Itself

This Washer has a whirling motion and moves up and down as it whirls. No paddles or machinery inside. Yet it takes the dirt out so quickly that a tubful is washed in six minutes! Washes anything from rugs to daintiest laces. Does it better than is done by hand or with any other washer. And actually pays for itself.

Women who have used the Washboard all their lives just rub their eyes in amazement the first time they see a 1900 Washer at work. They exclaim—"Can it be true that it washes clothes clean in six minutes!" They take out the clothes when the six minutes are up, and sure enough—they're white and clean, exactly as Mrs. Hopkins says. You just ought to write and get one on Free Trial, so you can see for yourself.

SOME HARD KNOCKS

Woman Gets Rid of "Coffee Heart."

The injurious action of Coffee on the heart of many persons is well known by physicians to be caused by Caffeine. This is the drug found by chemists in coffee and tea.

A woman suffered a long time with severe heart trouble and finally her doctor told her she must give up coffee, as that was the principal cause of the trouble. She writes:

"My heart was so weak it could not do its work properly. My husband would sometimes have to carry me from the table, and it would seem that I would never breathe again.

"The doctor told me that coffee was causing the weakness of my heart. He said I must stop it, but it seemed I could not give it up until I was down in bed with nervous prostration.

"For eleven weeks I lay there and suffered. Finally Husband brought home some Postum and I quit coffee and started new and right. Slowly I got well. Now I do not have any headaches, nor those spells with weak heart We know it is Postum that helped me. The Dr. said the other day, 'I never thought you would be what you are.' I used to weigh 92 pounds and now I weigh 158.

"Postum has done much for me and I would not go back to coffee again for any money, for I believe it would kill me if I kept at it. Postum must be well boiled according to directions on pkg., then it has a rich flavour and with cream is fine."

The Experience of Paul*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

AN old letter is opened for our study—one written in 57 A.D., eighteen hundred and fifty-two years ago; written in the first century, and yet full of fresh interest for us who are living in the twentieth century. Some things cannot grow old, such as the words of the apostle Paul, enshrined in Holy Writ. The letter was written to the Christians in Corinth, among whom he labored for eighteen months. He loved them, and some of them were going wrong, misled by false teachers who were Judaizers. And Paul loved them so for Christ's sake that he could not let them go. He wrote: "I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy." In fact, he wrote two letters to them, both in one year; the first from Ephesus, and the second from Macedonia. The latter is the subject of our study. Paul wrote many letters, but never one quite like this, because in a peculiar way he took the Corinthian Christians into his confidence; he admitted them, as it were, into the inner sanctuary of his being. But first he led them to consider his outer man, as a Hebrew, as an Israelite, as a child of Abraham. Paul could claim Abraham, Jacob and Benjamin as his forebears.

While the Judaizers, in turn, were claiming one such ancestor, Paul claimed that in him all three were centred.

And some Christian teachers had come among the Corinthians, who had not received the full light of the Gospel—such as Apollos—and they had their following. But Paul wrote about his larger experience, how he had "above measure" and "more abundantly" been beaten, stoned, shipwrecked, attacked by robbers, been assailed in cities, been exhausted by hunger and thirst and lack of clothing—all for the sake of the Gospel; and Paul wrote of them as "those things which are without." But he would yield to no man in what he had endured. Paul gave the Corinthians this view of himself, not in the spirit of boasting, but in order that they might know he had been fully tested, and was not afraid of what man could do to him or say about him, because he was fully trusting in God.

The Inner Man

"I know a man in Christ." He had known him for fourteen years—himself—as a new man in Christ. And such was the thrill of that new birth that he hardly knew whether he was "in the body or out of it," but was as one "caught up to the third heaven"—Paradise; and there he heard things too grand for human speech.

Was Paul, therefore, proud because of his wonderful experience? Oh, no; he takes the Corinthians into his confidence, and writes of his "weakness," and of the nearness of Satan to buffet him, which he refers to as a "thorn." How useless for us to argue what that thorn might have been—"weak eyes," "poor health," etc.! all we can safely conclude about it is that it was some affliction of body, mind or spirit, that Paul had to struggle against day after day. In any event, he would have his Corinthian friends know that he was not a perfect man, but that he was struggling still for the mastery over himself and his environment. There was a human touch in this that brought Paul very near to the Corinthian Christians. It has been said that "these words spoken by Paul concerning himself suggest the picture of an old general who bares his breast before his rebellious legions and shows them the wound prints which prove that he is not unworthy to be called their commander." Paul needed thus to open his heart, particularly about being caught up into the third heaven, because there were critics in Corinth who discredited his claim to be considered an apostle, because he had not been one of the twelve whom Jesus had gathered about him.

"In prisons more abundantly; in stripes above measure; in deaths oft." Paul was speaking as an Oriental to Orientals. To our Western ears it sounds like exaggeration. But Orientals are nothing if not redundant in the use of language. The following proverbs will illustrate this:

"At the sight of a glow-worm the timid cry 'Fire!'"

"A thousand friends are few, and one enemy far too many."

"If you'll cook the meal with words, I'll promise an ocean of butter."

"The judge who takes five cucumbers for a bribe will admit any evidence for ten beds of melons."

"Speak one word while you listen to a thousand."

"With patience sour grapes become sweetmeat, and mulberry leaves turn to satin."

The Fasces

In Acts 16:24 we read about Paul and Silas having their feet made fast in the stocks in the Philippi prison. There were other forms of stocks than this shown in the picture; sometimes the neck and the arms were included, as well as the legs. It is hard to conceive of what the torture must have been.

Another form of dealing with prisoners was to chain them between two soldiers. This was the way Paul was imprisoned in Rome, in his own hired house.

"Forty stripes save one." The scourge with which the stripes were inflicted consisted of three lashes, with pieces of metal fastened in, attached to a handle. The one to be scourged was tied by his arms to a pillar, his body bared to the hips, and he was made to bend forward while his back was lashed with the scourge. It was a Jewish method of punishment, and under the law not more than forty strokes could be given (Deut. 25:1-3). Indeed, they always stopped one short, for fear of exceeding the forty.

A Roman Prisoner and His Guards

"Thrice was I beaten with rods."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

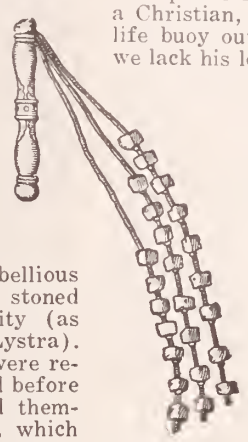
The fasces, or rods, were cut from the elm or birch tree, and bound together with thongs; an axe was inserted among the rods. The rods, of course, were drawn from the bundle when the prisoner was to be beaten.



The Scourge

Jesus was beaten with rods when Pilate delivered him to the Roman soldiers to be scourged.

"I was stoned." It was a form of capital punishment inflicted by the Jews on idolaters, blasphemers, Sabbath breakers and stubborn or rebellious children. The person to be stoned was usually led out of the city (as was the case with Paul at Lystra). Witnesses against the culprit were required to begin the stoning, and before doing so they usually divested themselves of their outer clothing, which was given in charge of a keeper. Paul himself had been the keeper at the stoning of Stephen.

"In hunger and thirst." In the summer time the pools and streams dry up in Palestine and other Oriental lands; indeed, there is always a scanty supply of water, so that it is carried about the streets and sold by water-carriers. Paul may have thirsted because he did not always find a water-carrier, and sometimes he may not have had money to buy the water.

Bread and olives are usually the food which an Oriental traveler carries in his scrip, a skin bag fastened to his shoulders. And Paul had sometimes been hungry for lack of bread and olives. And he also lacked clothing; "nakedness," of which he speaks, does not mean nudity, but rather the lack of an outer garment. Paul did not always lack such a garment, because this was the cloak which he wrote to Timothy he had left at Troas, and wished him to bring it with him when he should come.

The Beautiful Afterward of Sorrow

"He hath said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee; for my power is made perfect in weakness" (II. Cor. 12:9).

Some one has said, "Marble has long been the delight of the eyes and the wealth of architecture among civilized nations." Ruskin calls attention to the fact that veins and zones in the marble, which give it its chief beauty, are the record of its ancient torture, the signs and bands of the great earth agonies through which it has passed. A woman who had passed through great affliction, but had found at last through Christian trust and prayer the calmness and heavenly-mindedness that often follow sad trials, repeated with great feeling the divine assurance, "No chastening seemeth for the present joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness in them that are exercised thereby," and then she exclaimed, "Oh, the beautiful afterward!"

It will be instructive for us the next time we stand in front of a veined piece of marble to think back over some of our experiences, following the dark tracings in the marble. Perhaps we may thus be helped to a feeling of gratitude to God that we have never felt before. The apostle Paul did not need to have his afflictions embalmed in marble before he could thank God for them.

At one time the captain of the lake steamer Blake found himself in a storm, drifting toward the breakers. In order to save his vessel from utter destruction, he opened a hole in the bottom and let it sink in deep water. After the storm had abated, divers were sent down, and it was found that the vessel was resting upon the sand. It was then raised and repaired. The brave captain had to sink his vessel in order to save it. And God is compelled to sink some people with afflictions before he can save them. But the apostle Paul was not that sort of a Christian, though rather he made a life buoy out of an affliction. But if we lack his loving confidence and faith in God, then let us be willing to sink that we may be raised again.

A physician went to a neighbor's house to tell a wife and mother of the sudden death of her absent husband. The fresh blow was indeed terrible to her, for she had a large family and very little property. When the first wild burst of sorrow was over, she looked up in agony and said, "But what shall I do, doctor?" "My dear woman, I don't know, but all I can say is, I only wish I had as many promises of God to take right home to myself as you have just now. The Bible is full of promises to those who are in your case." And the woman has lived to realize the truth and preciousness of those promises.

In Psalm 3:3 God is called "the Lifter-up."

Do not cheat thy heart and tell her
Grief shall pass away;
Hope for fairer times in future,
And forget to-day.

Tell her if you will that sorrow
Need not come in vain;
Tell her that the lesson taught her
Far outweighs the pain.

ADELAIDE PROCTOR.

The great preacher, Charles Spurgeon, said: "There is no sleeping draught that I know of like contemplation of the love of God. Nothing can give the jaded spirit rest like drawing nigh to God." Let those who are seeking a remedy for insomnia take notice.

But King David had discovered the remedy long before Mr. Spurgeon. How beautiful are the words he has written:

My mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips,
When I remember thee upon my bed,
And meditate on thee in the night watches.
For thou hast been my help,
And in the shadows of thy wings will I rejoice.

These are beautiful words to repeat when the cares that infest the day loom up in the night and magnify themselves into giants of frightful mien. It is good in hours of wakefulness to have the habit of thinking about God.

One of the noble Scotch Covenanters, driven from home and friends by Romish persecutors, said: "Enemies think themselves satisfied that we are put to wander in mosses and upon mountains, but even amidst the storms of these last two nights I cannot express what sweet times I have had, when I had no covering but the dark curtains of night; yea, in the silent watch my mind was led out to admire the deep and inexpressible ocean of joy wherein the whole family of heaven swim."

And so the soul of Paul has been marching on, and the brave, strong words which he wrote so long ago have been a help to thousands upon thousands of Christians in all ages, and will be through time and eternity, for words are not finite.

A company of infidels, seeing one of their number greatly troubled at the approach of death, advised him to embrace Christianity, saying, "If it be false, it can do you no harm; but if it should be true, you will be a great gainer." Sometimes God drives men where the best alone is possible.

We are reminded of the olive tree, whose fruit, crushed beneath a heavy weight, yields precious oil for lighting of the darkness. So Christians, under the weight of affliction, yield the graces of sympathy and humility that light up society.

As Interesting as "Ben-Hur"

WHILE Francis Trevelyan Miller was preparing his great book, Hero Tales from American Life, for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, he wrote as follows:

"We are keeping it in mind continually that these tales are to go into the Christian homes of America, where they are to be read in the family circle about the fireside and listened to by the entire household, from the youngest child to the aged grandparent.

The volume is, therefore, invested with that intense human interest that grips the hearts of all ages. Attention is called to the various phases of heroism that are treated in these Hero Tales. The idea is to tell 100 inspiring stories, taken from all the walks and phases of life. We would particularly emphasize that the treatment gives to many of these tales the dramatic qualities of Ben-Hur."

This new—wonderful—marvelous—amazing—astonishing invention, this saver—deliverer—champion of overburdened housewives should be in every home—once used you wouldn't be without it for love nor money. Weighs only four pounds. Operated by child or frail women. No expense—no labor. Terrific air suction takes every grain of dust, dirt, grit and germs from carpets, rugs, mattings, etc., while they remain on the floor, raises no dust, hence no dusting required. Every particle drawn into cleaner—then dumped. Abandon brooms, brushes, dust cloths. They don't clean your rugs and carpets. Brooms and sweepers fill the air with clouds of dust, and remove a portion of the surface dirt. The Home Vacuum Cleaner sucks up into itself not only the surface dirt, but the dirt, dust, grime and germs from within and beneath—from the very warp and fibre. No more necessity to go through the disturbance and upheaval of house cleaning. Home Vacuum Cleaner keeps them clean all the time—cleans them on the floor.

Saves time, strength, health and money. Nothing like it anywhere—nothing can take its place.

Away with hard work—away with slaving toil. Send to-day for a cleaner.

$6.00. Sent Anywhere in the World. Price, $6.00

NOT SOLD IN STORES

Not $25.00, $50.00 or $100.00—not the high prices you have been reading about, but a price everyone can afford. Have a clean home, hours of leisure. Adopt the easy way—the modern way—the sanitary way—the scientific way. All Hail! Home Vacuum Cleaner, marvel of the 20th Century, saver and champion of overworked womanhood.

Each machine tested before shipping—each guaranteed as represented or money back. The price insignificant—the benefits everlasting. Will last for years. Not sold in stores. Read elsewhere what women say.

Don't delay—don't hesitate—don't wait for others—don't wonder if it's true—It is true—every word—couldn't be exaggerated—words can't describe it. Stop short! Put drudgery behind you—leisure and health before. Enjoy yourself now—tomorrow may be too late. Six dollars will do it all—six dollars brings relief from hard work brings time to enjoy yourself—to visit friends—to read, shop, etc. Pays for itself in saving of carpets, rugs and mattings. Send today. Stop everything and write NOW.

A LIVING FROM POULTRY

$1,500 from 60 Hens in 10 Months on a City Lot 40 Feet Square

To the average poultryman that would seem impossible, and when we tell you that we have actually done a $1,500 poultry business with 60 hens on a corner in the city garden 40 feet wide by 40 feet long we are simply stating facts. It would not be possible to get such returns by any one of the systems of poultry keeping recommended and practiced by the American people, still it is an easy matter when the new PHILO SYSTEM is adopted.

The Philo System is Unlike All Other Ways of Keeping Poultry and in many respects just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible, and getting unheard-of results that are hard to believe without seeing.

The New System Covers All Branches of the Work Necessary for Success
from selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner.

Two Pound Broilers in Eight Weeks
are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler without any loss, and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing here three cents per pound above the highest market price.

Our Six-Months-Old Pullets are Laying at the Rate of 24 Eggs Each Per Month
in a space of two square feet for each bird. No green-cut bone of any description is fed, and the food used is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, the Philo System of Poultry Keeping, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and 15 pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

Don't Let the Chicks Die in the Shell
One of our secrets of success is to save all the chickens that are fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick and believed to be the secret of the ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen.

Three-Pound Roasters Ten Weeks Old

Chicken Feed at 15 Cents a Bushel
Our book tells how to make the best green food with but little trouble and have a good supply, any day in the year, winter or summer. It is just as impossible to get a large egg yield without green food as it is to keep a cow without hay or fodder.

Our New Brooder Saves 2 Cents on Each Chicken
No lamp required. No danger of chilling, over-heating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all the lice off the chickens automatically or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of 25 to 50 Cents.

TESTIMONIALS

205 S. Clinton St., Baltimore, Md., May 28, 1909.
E. R. PHILO, Publisher, Elmira, N.Y.
Dear Sir: I have embarked in the poultry business on a small scale (Philo System) and am having the best of success so far, sixty-eight per cent of eggs hatched by hens, all chicks alive and healthy at this writing; they are now three weeks old. Mr. Philo is a public benefactor, and I don't believe his System can be improved upon, and so I am now looking for more yard room, having but 15x30 where I am now. Yours truly,
C. H. LEACH.

South Britain, Conn., Ap. 14, 1909.
MR. E. R. PHILO, Elmira, N.Y.
Dear Sir: I have followed your System as close as I could; the result is a complete success. If there can be any improvement on nature, your Brooder is it. The first experience I had with your System was last December. I hatched 17 chicks under two hens, put them as soon as hatched in one of your Brooders out of doors, and at the age of three months I sold them at 35c. a pound. They then averaged 2½ lbs. each, and the man I sold them to said they were the finest he ever saw, and he wants all I can spare this season. Yours truly,
A. E. NELSON.

Dear Sir: You certainly have the greatest System the world has ever known. I have had experience with poultry, but I know you have the System that brings the real profits.
Yours, JESSE UNDERWOOD.

Brockport, N.Y., Sept. 12, 1908.
MR. E. R. PHILO, Elmira, N.Y.
Dear Sir: I have had perfect success brooding chickens your way. I think your method will raise stronger, healthier chicks than the old way of using lamps, and besides it saves so much work and risk. Yours respectfully,
M. S. GOODING.

Who Went Up Into Canaan?

By C. D. KENDALL

I HAVE been a constant and delighted reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years. I enjoy the paper through and through, and especially the page or pages devoted to questions and answers.

There is one question that has been answered a great many times, and I am strongly of the opinion that the correct answer has not been given. The question is, How many of the Jews who came out of Egypt with Moses were permitted to enter the Holy Land? Your last answer says: "None of those who set out from Egypt ever reached the Promised Land save Joshua and Caleb. The first generation of the Exodus all died in the wilderness (see Num. 26:65)."

Now will you kindly refer to the record, Num. 1:1, 2, 3, 20, 22, 26, 45, 46? You will notice only twenty years and older were numbered. Notice that the tribe of Levi was not numbered, neither were the women and children under twenty years. This was done the first day of the second month of the second year after leaving Egypt. Only those able to go to war were numbered (Num. 14:22, 23, 29, 30, 31). Verse 29 says "All that were numbered of you from twenty years old upward which have murmured against me (30) doubtless ye shall not come into the . . . except Caleb and Joshua." Please read carefully verse 31. The children were to come in. Deut. 2:14-16; Num. 26:63, 64.

This numbering, you will notice, was by Moses and Eleazar the priest, Aaron's son. The first numbering was done by Moses and Aaron at Sinai, one year after coming out of Egypt, and remember they only numbered those of twenty years and older who were fit for war. The tribe of Levi was not numbered. The prohibition against entering Canaan was not pronounced against the women and children, but against the men of war who sinned (Num. 14:31). The children were those under twenty when they came out of Egypt and those born during the wandering (Josh. 24:31-33). Eleazar the priest, the son of Aaron, of the tribe of Levi, made a priest within a year after leaving Egypt, went into Canaan with Joshua, and died there after the death of Joshua; so from the record we know that Eleazar went into the Holy Land, where he died; and I am fully persuaded that the decree of the Almighty was not made against the innocent women and children, but against those who sinned against him.

I think we may reasonably conclude that Moses and Aaron, when they numbered the people for the army at Sinai, took all the names of the men with their tribes and families. Also we may conclude that, as the men who had sinned died off in the wilderness, their places were filled by the young men as they arrived at the age of twenty years, so the host was kept up in numbers.

You will notice that the last numbering made by Moses and Eleazar was made in the plain east of the Jordan. Now please read Num. 26:62-65. What was this last numbering for, if not to see that all the men of the host who had sinned were dead?

Newton, Ill.

Singing to the Cows

A CONTEMPORARY tells of an interesting phase of dairying in the West. A progressive woman, who owns and runs a dairy farm in Wisconsin, and who has some unique ideas of her own, declares that by playing and singing to her cows she gets a supply of milk one-third greater than that she got before. "Every cow in her herd," says the writer, "and they are all pure-bred Jerseys, hears at least one tune at milking time. Most of the younger cows show a liking for quiet airs, and any loud or demonstrative music irritates them. The player usually accompanies herself on a mandolin." Her experiment, it is added, is regarded with amusement by those who know of it, and it is not at all likely that singing to the cows will become popular.

When Autumn Tints the Woods

WHEN Autumn tints the woods with gleaming gold,
And the wild birds their southward passage hold,
Then earth and sky laugh at the storms foretold.

But close behind the pomp of colors gay
Stands a dim warrior clad in misty gray,
And crested with an icy crown alway.

Let him come forth and strip the woodlands bare—
For winter's pillaging I have no shred of care—
The sun shines on each shadowy nook if thou art there.

Though spring flowers smile beneath thy lightsome tread;
Or summer shed its blossoms on thy head;
Or autumn frame thee in its gold and red;

Or winter smite thee with its morsels keen—
Still, still the same thy true eyes' azure sheen,
And through all seasons my heart hails thee queen.

How the World's Richest Man Got His Start.

John D. Rockefeller, the Standard Oil Magnate, started out as a Traveling Map Salesman, and has worked his way up to be the wealthiest man in the world. Salesmanship is the best paid, most congenial profession in the world. Thousands of Traveling Salesmen earn from $2,500 to as high as $15,000 or $20,000 a year and expenses. There are over 600,000 employed in the United States and Canada at the present time, and the demand for good Salesmen always exceeds the supply. Any man with a common school education, and who has tact and perseverance, can enter and make a success in this splendid profession. The National Salesman's Training Association issues a little book, entitled A Knight of the Grip, which will be sent free to any one who will write for it. It gives complete details about how to become a first-class Salesman and secure a position as a Traveling Representative of some prominent firm, also testimonials from men placed in good positions. If you are ambitious and desire to increase your earnings from two to ten times what they are at present, write to the Association to-day, at any one of its offices either at New York, Chicago, Kansas City, Minneapolis or San Francisco. Address Letter to Dept. 496, and mention paper.

A Schoolroom Revival

A READER of this journal, Alex. W. Smith, sends the following interesting account of a revival service at the Mount View Schoolhouse, Spartanburg County, S. C.:

"There were more than forty professions of faith at a single meeting. The teacher had certain impressions that he told the pastor about, and the pastor approved of them. The mourners' bench was pointed out to the children, and they soon filled it. The Spirit worked among them and they nearly all gave their hearts to Jesus.

"We had been having a protracted meeting at the church, near the schoolhouse. Many of the children had responded to the propositions made by the preacher, so, last Friday, I gave a little card to each child and wrote on the back of it, 'Jesus loves,' and the name of the child. I afterwards asked the pastor, Mr. Hill, to come to the schoolhouse at two o'clock, and we would have a service there. He came and talked to the children. He told them that they could be converted, and accept Jesus as their Saviour, just as soon as they knew good from evil. Nearly all the children knelt. The pastor and I went to every child, and, as I told him their names, he laid his hand on their heads and said a special prayer for each. After the prayer service, more than forty gave their hands as a token that they had accepted Jesus as Saviour. I asked one of the little ones why he knelt, and he replied that 'he loved Jesus, and wanted to be happy.'"

"BEFORE THE DOCTOR COMES"

THERE are many things that may be done, or may need to be done, before the doctor arrives. Do you know them? If an accident happens in your family, are you prepared to act promptly and wisely?

If you live in the country, a long distance from the doctor, and some serious illness occurs, do you know the best thing to do while waiting for him to come? Our New Premium Book, Before the Doctor Comes, aims to guide you in the matter. It is a concise, comprehensive, practical description of ordinary accidents and diseases, with the best advice as to the treatment to be pursued. There are chapters on accidents and poisons. The various diseases are classified, so as to be referred to readily.

To refresh the reader's knowledge of physiology there is a separate discussion of the Normal Human Body, which gives a brief description of the organs of the body and an account of their functions. Space has been given to Personal Hygiene, for the art of keeping well is just as important as the art of getting well. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Do you know how to nurse the sick? Can you carry out the doctor's orders as to poultices, fomentations, etc.? The chapter on home nursing describes clearly and concisely these important adjuncts to successful treatment.

A glossary, which defines all technical words, has been added, that the meaning may always be perfectly clear.

The index is thorough and complete, and convenient for ready reference.

This book will be a valuable addition to the home. It deals with vital issues and teaches valuable lessons.

This Generously Illustrated Volume, "Before the Doctor Comes" (400 pages, bound in Green and Gold); our Incomparable "Dreamland" Calendar for 1910, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD weekly for one whole year (ALL THREE), for only TWO DOLLARS.

Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

J. A. C., Brookshire, Tex. To what race do the Armenians belong, and since when have they become Christians?

The Armenians are Caucasians, and have been Christians from a very early period. It is related that Abgarus, King of Edessa, in Armenia, was converted to Christianity by one of the early Christian evangelists, and that all his people soon followed him in adopting the new religion. This was presumably in the second century A.D. The Armenian state church is Gregorian (Christian), but it became degenerate, and in recent years the country has been a field of active missionary enterprise.

K. N. K., Hot Springs, Ark. When and where did Columbus die?

Columbus died at Valladolid, in Castile, Spain, March 20, 1506.

S. K., Newport, N. H. When and where was the first savings bank established in the United States?

The first savings bank was the Philadelphia Savings Fund Society, established in 1816. One was established in Boston the same year.

H. E. B., Whitesboro, N. Y. When Agrippa said to Paul, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian," was that an honest confession, or did he mean, "With little persuasion, Paul, thou wouldest try to make me a Christian"?

The Revised Version is to be preferred in this passage (Acts 26:28), which it makes much clearer, viz., "With but little persuasion thou wouldest fain make me a Christian"; (verse 29) "and Paul said, I would to God that whether with little or with much," etc. Some commentators interpret it to mean, "Thou art for making me a Christian too summarily," but the majority read it as, "In a little time (or with a little more argument) thou wilt persuade me." Agrippa was practically confessing that Paul had made a deep impression on his mind and that he felt strongly drawn to his view in spite of himself.

E. A. W., Springfield, Ill. You say it was not until after Joseph of Arimathea had come to the front, after the crucifixion (see John 19:39), that Nicodemus openly showed himself a follower of Jesus. Did you forget John 7:50, 51?

The words of Nicodemus in John 7:50, 51 marked his first reappearance after three years' absence from the Gospel narrative. He was sitting as a member of the Council, and, noting their indecent haste to condemn the untried Saviour, he ventured a proper legal question, being apparently pressed by his conscience to do so. Webster, Wilkinson and other leading commentators point out the feebleness and half-heartedness of his defense of Jesus on this occasion, in contrast with the fierce attitude of the Pharisees. Their angry inquiry, "Art thou also of Galilee?" extinguished the last spark of Nicodemus' flickering courage. He had at that moment the great opportunity to come out for the Master, but he failed to embrace it. Consequently, we repeat, it was not until after the crucifixion, when the whole tragedy had been enacted, that his conscience drove him to open avowal of belief in Christ.

Mrs. E. S. W., Johnsonburg, Pa. We need some place where our boys can meet and have a good time in the evenings. Now they have only the saloons. Do you think that if I should write to some of our famous rich men they would send me money to start such a place? If they only would, I think we might keep it running.

Possibly one of your churches might grant the use of its lecture-room for a night or two a week for some such purpose. It is sometimes wise to begin on a small scale, and feel one's way carefully. In some places, it has been found best to establish a boys' club, with badges and pass-words, motto, flag, etc. They can meet once or twice a week at first, one or more older persons being present, and having a programme for each meeting, with some business at first, and games, reading and music later. They should have some definite object, like the purchase of an athletic field, the preservation of some historic structure, or the raising of a monument to some great townsman. Gradually, as they get used to each other and grow to enjoy the meetings, they may be able to hire a room, or even a house. Rich men have so many calls that they are likely to dismiss most of them without comment. See if you cannot attain your very excellent object without outside help.

M. W. S., New York. It is said in Rom. 8:23 that adoption refers to the resurrection, and also that adoption pertains to Israel according to the flesh (Rom. 9:3, 4). What prospect is there for the Anglo-Saxon race in the coming resurrection?

The passage in Rom. 8:23 has been much controverted. The simplest interpretation is that the whole order of nature sympathizes with man's miseries, and looks forward to his redemption as the period of its own emancipation from the blight of sin and death. In Rom. 9:3, 4, the "adoption" referred to should not be confounded with the spiritual adoption that flows from union to God's Son, as it refers to "the purely external and theocratic, yet real adoption, whereby Israel was separated from the surrounding heathen and constituted a family of God." This interpretation is confirmed by the reference to the "glory" (the ark), the covenants, the Sinaitic law, the temple worship or service and the promises, in the same chapter. It does not concern the resurrection.

J. T., Wilmar, Minn. 1. Two teachers in the schools here believe in evolution. One of them was telling her class that man was once a monkey, but that he was wise and educated to-day. Then one of her boys said, "I thought that Adam was the first man, and that Solomon was the wisest man." 2. I have always understood that Adam lived about 4,000 years before Christ. Now Myer's Ancient History has it different. It says that there are traces of man ages before this.

1. The Darwinian theory, to which you refer, has now very little hold upon the scientific world. Many leading scientists have rejected it altogether. 2. The dates on the margin of the Bible (as we have repeatedly explained) are not a part of the book itself, but are the computations of Archbishop Ussher, a very worthy divine, who lived several centuries ago. The Bible itself, far from fixing a date for the Creation, merely says, "In the beginning——" Hence there is no contradiction between science and Scripture on this ground. Science simply shows us that the world and the human race are much older than we think.

Mrs. Sarah J. Bird ("Mother Bird") writes: "I sent a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to Mrs. P——, Burnham, Pa., and she writes of the great good it is doing, and now she herself sends for another copy, to carry on the good work." Mrs. P—— writes: "When the extra copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD comes we give it to Mr. and Mrs. W——, old people, who enjoy it so much. By Sunday they have read it, and give it to Mr. H——, a well-read and recently converted man, who greatly enjoys it. When he is through with it, he gives it to an old 'shut-in,' who also reads and enjoys it. I hope THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may long continue in the great and good work it is doing for the unfortunate and poverty-stricken."

These are examples of many similar letters we are constantly receiving from friends in many parts of the country. Such kind words and thoughts, so heartily expressed, are full of encouragement.

Mrs. L. H., Groton, N. Y. Is there a pension bureau for nurses in the United States?

The head of the Bellevue Training School for Nurses says that there is no such bureau. There should be one. It is to be hoped that this answer may reach some person who may help to inaugurate a pension system for this noble class.

P. H. Y., Grafton, Mass. Where are the Chincha Islands? I cannot find them in any school geography.

The Chincha group of islands lie about eleven miles off the coast of Peru. The three most important islands are Isla del Norte, Isla del Medio and Isla del Sur.

W. W. W., Westover, Md. 1. Why is the moon sometimes so far to the south and at other times high overhead, and why does she seem now to move from southwest to northeast? 2. Why are the lunations of the moon not of equal length?

1. The plane of the moon's orbit is not the same as the plane on which the earth moves around the sun. The moon's plane is inclined to ours five degrees. This makes the full moon five degrees higher in the winter than in the summer. The inclination of the moon's orbit is irregular, but every 173 days it passes through all of its possible changes. At the December solstice the moon's altitude is from 60 to 70 degrees, and about in the path of the sun in summer. 2. The lunations vary slightly in length, owing to the eccentricity of the orbits of both the earth and moon. The difference in length is never more than 3 hours and 20 minutes in the month. This is hardly perceptible except to scientific observers.

R. L., Dallas, Tex. Where can I find the words of the epitaph beginning, "Life is like a winter day"?

These are the lines referred to:

" Our life is but a winter day,
Some only breakfast and away,
Others to dinner stay
And are full fed;
The oldest man but sups
And goes to bed;
Large is his debt
That lingers out the day;
He that goes soonest
Has the least to pay."

S. B. N., Waco, Tex. I must prepare myself for city missionary work, to be a missionary in my own town, Waco. I wish to know the duties of one in such work and where I should go to prepare myself.

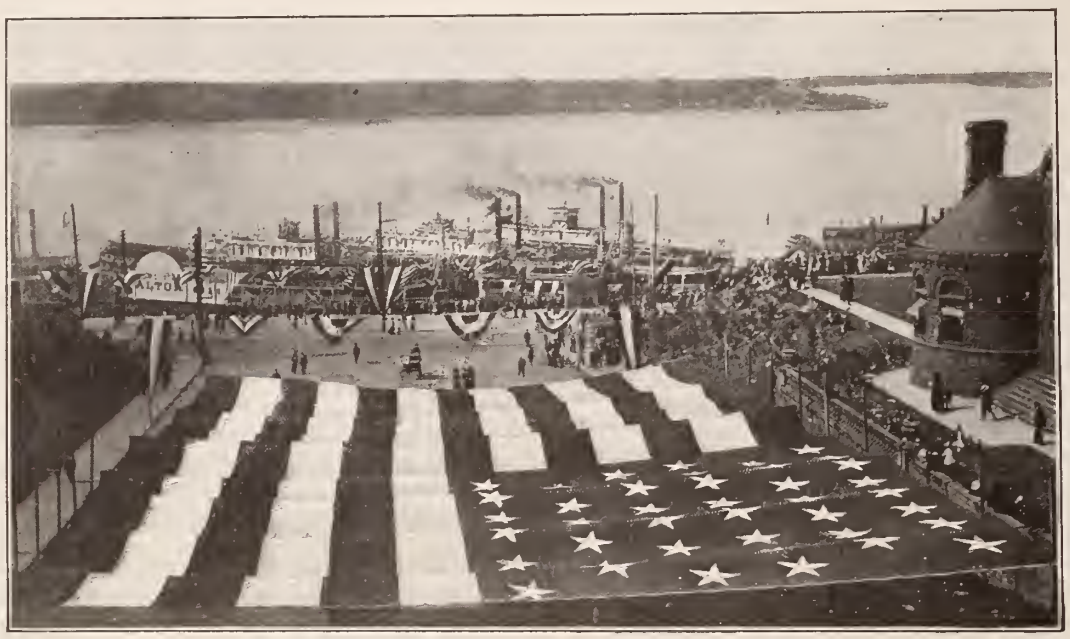
The foregoing question was submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to Rev. A. B. Schauffer, president of the New York City Mission, who replies as follows: "I know of no place where a layman can be fitted for city mission work better than the Bible Training School, W. W. White, superintendent, 541 Lexington Avenue, New York. Should New York City be inconvenient as a location for study, there is Moody Training School, in Chicago, which would serve about the same purpose."

M. E. M., Rahway, N. J. Which of our States leads in the divorce record, and what is the general standing?

According to the Census Bureau official reports, the Western States lead in the number of divorces, the highest being the State of Washington—513 per 100,000 of the married population. Delaware has the lowest—43 per 100,000. The divorce rate has grown steadily with the increase of population. Two-thirds of the divorces between 1887 and 1906 were granted to wives. Actors, showmen and musicians lead in the list of divorce applicants; farmers are seldom represented.

Miss J. C., Whiting, Ia. 1. Why was not Paul delivered from prison at Cæsarea, as he had been before, instead of going to Rome? 2. Did he ever lose faith in God? 3. Do you think people bring their own trouble on themselves, or does God send it?

1. From the time of his detention in Cæsarea probably to the close of his life Paul was in Roman custody. This was really a protection to him, as otherwise he must have fallen a victim to the Jews, who were bitter against him. He was treated humanely and considerately. Besides, at Cæsarea, Paul had stood on his rights as a Roman citizen, and having himself appealed unto Cæsar—that is, from a lower to a higher jurisdiction—we must infer that he had no desire for liberty until his case could be tried on its merits before the imperial court. 2. There is no evidence in the Scripture narrative that he lost faith. His confidence in God and in his own mission seems rather to have augmented with every new experience and grown stronger in the face of opposition and persecution. 3. This is an old metaphysical question, and one that can be answered both ways. God permitted Job to be tested with trouble, and, if trouble be evil, then we have the authority of Isa. 45:7 for assuming that it is divinely permitted. Evil, or disorder, is the disturbance or violation of a fixed law, whose normal operation is altogether good and perfect. The true Christian attitude is one of confidence in the promise that no real evil shall befall those that trust in the Lord. See Ps. 23:4 and Ps. 91:10; Prov. 12:21, etc.



THE LARGEST AMERICAN FLAG EVER MADE

IT is 120 feet long and 80 feet wide, and the stripes are 6 feet 1 inch wide. There are 49 stars, each 5 feet from tip to tip. The scene is at Memphis, Tenn., with the President's steamboat fleet on the river as a background. The flag makes a magnificent showing and aroused much enthusiasm.

N. F. Hoijer, Alliance Delegate

A HERO OF THE MISSION FIELD

A FEW days ago there came to the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the Bible House, New York, a short, sturdily-built, fresh-complexioned man of middle age. His skin, bronzed by much exposure to sun and wind, proclaimed him a traveler. Full-bearded, smiling-faced and with kindly eyes, he had a personality which at once inspired confidence. He was simple in speech and modest in demeanor. Yet this little man was of the stuff of which real heroes are made. Indeed, there are few men living to-day who can point to a career so full of dangers and adventures as that of N. F. Hoijer, delegate of the Russian Evangelical Alliance, who is now on his first visit to the great Christian republic of the West.

Mr. Hoijer was born in Wermland, Sweden, in 1857. In 1880 the Union of Swedish Missions engaged him as seamen's missionary at Kronstadt. After having spent a short time there in very successful work, he went to St. Petersburg, where he soon took a leading position in the movement started by Lord Radstock and Colonel Paschkaff. After the assassination of Alexander II., in 1882, a season of devastation and persecution broke out in Russia. Colonel Paschkaff, Count Korff, and many others, were banished; others were imprisoned and sent to Siberia, and not a few had to pay with their lives for quitting the Orthodox Church.

At this trying time Mr. Hoijer, in the face of many difficulties, carried on his Gospel work uninterruptedly. Through his kind offices a number of Russians, both men and women, who, but for his courage and wisdom, would have been sent to Siberia, were saved from the danger of exile. He successfully established mission stations at various places, which are still prospering. In St. Petersburg he founded a Finnish Temperance Association, and procured for it government protection. Here, even in the worst of times, many Finns and Swedes, and even persecuted Russians, found refuge, and were enabled to study the Word of God without fear.

In the Caucasus, he founded a Swedish Mission, which is still going on successfully. He won the confidence alike of the ancient Armenian nation and of the wild tribes of the Kurds. He organized an Alliance of Oriental Evangelicals, which has been very successful in uniting believers in practical missionary enterprise. It was he who started the still prospering Swedish Mission in Persia. He carried out a bold mission tour through regions regarded as inaccessible, and founded the mission in Kashgar. He next penetrated into China from the west—a feat second to few in the annals of missions. The result of this journey was an effort to plant a chain of mission stations along his adventurous route.

For a time Mr. Hoijer was at the head of the German-Oriental Mission in Persia, and was charged with a commission to minister to the material needs of the Armenians while they were being persecuted by the Turks. In this capacity he traveled all over the districts about the slopes of Mount Ararat. He sheltered many Armenians in his house, and saved the lives of a number. The Armenian people respected him so greatly that their Patriarchal Synod voluntarily elected him as Prior of the ancient monastery of Faddens.

He afterward served the London Evangelical Alliance by bringing help to persecuted Stundists in Russia. The work brought with it no little danger from the Russian government. Once, when he was forced to flee from Tiflis, he carried out a most remarkable enterprise. Accompanied by a Kurdish servant—a former robber—he rode over a trackless country, and, in a very short time, went right through to Poltava. It was a journey of more than nine hundred miles. At one time he was in imminent danger from wild Moslem tribes, but providentially escaped.

In a period of danger, he organized a Missionary Committee in Kiev—the metropolis of Russian Orthodoxy—and another in Moscow. In St. Petersburg he formed a similar committee, which numbered among its directors Baron P. Nicolay and the Director of Prisons, M. Maximofsky, who afterward became a victim of assassins.

Last autumn Mr. Hoijer visited Denmark, and aroused such an interest there in Russian work that two ministers, Pastors Mallerup and Matthieson (the latter editor of the Dagblad), as well as a business man, traveled with him to the Conference of the Russian Evangelical Alliance, held at Astrakhanka. At that conference Mr. Hoijer was chosen to visit Western Europe and America as its representative.

Mr. Hoijer at one time went to Odessa, Russia, to labor among sailors. Openings soon presented themselves also among the people of the city, and through the preaching of the Word there grew up a substantial Evangelical congregation. On leaving Odessa he was led to settle at Tiflis, the ideal being ever before his mind of keeping his face eastward toward China. There, also, the good seed was fruitful, and a congregation of believers was organized. Other journeys took the earnest traveler into Kurdistan and Persia; and in order to be able to deliver the great message to the people of these lands he learned Armenian, as well as one of the many dialects of Tartar which are spoken all the way from Constantinople to Peking. The latter was of high value in later travels.

One journey was made over the Caspian Sea, by way of Bokhara, to Samarkand. While there Mr. Hoijer had an important conversation with a mollah, when several officers from Afghanistan were present. These men listened intently and quietly; but when questioned as to their attitude to the truth thus proclaimed, they frankly admitted that if he had preached in the same way in their own land they would at once have killed him.

All this time Mr. Hoijer's heart was full of faith that God would yet open up his way to the Far East. Friends declared he would never be allowed to reach Kashgar, but they gave him the money to

EVERLASTING LOVE

TEXT: Jer. 31 : 3—"Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee."

WITHOUT doubt the primary application of these words is to God's ancient people, during their Babylonish captivity. Their exile was long, their hardships were great, and their sorrows were many. There was danger that they might lose heart and hope, and suppose that God had utterly forsaken them during this painful experience. In his loving kindness and tender mercy, God was pleased to send them this gracious message: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee." It is almost impossible for us fully to realize what comfort these words must have brought to the exiled people of God.

The years pass, and the words become still more significant, beautiful and tender. We are standing near the cross of Calvary. The heavens are darkened, the earth is quaking, Jesus is dying. He bowed his head upon his breast; and, if we listen well, we shall hear him virtually say: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee." Eternity dawns; the quick and the dead stand before the great white throne. On the right of the Judge are the redeemed; on his left, the condemned. We hear him say: "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." And, as we listen, we seem to hear him say, in tones of matchless tenderness: "Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee."

A Personal Love

Allow me to call your attention to the characteristics of this unspeakable love, as they are described in this beautiful text. You will observe that it is a personal love: "I have loved thee." It is personal in a twofold sense: it is the love of a personal God, and it is love to an individual person. God is not simply a force making for righteousness; God is a person. God is not simply a Creator; God is a Father. This love is personal, also, in its subjects: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." It is most interesting to see how the personal pronouns appear in the promises of God. If you were to remove this personal element from the Bible, you would rob the Bible of many of its most tender and beautiful promises. It is interesting, also, to see how the personal element appears in the earthly life of our Lord. If you were to remove from the New Testament all Christ's conversations with individual men and women, you would strip the New Testament of many of its most instructive parts.

Christ dealt very largely with individual souls. You remember his conversation with Nicodemus. He had then an audience of only one, and yet he poured out his soul to Nicodemus with a fulness and freeness and faithfulness never surpassed during his earthly ministry. When you want to know the part which each Person of the blessed Trinity performs in the work of human redemption, you must turn to our Lord's conversation with Nicodemus. It was a nocturnal interview. It had been sought by Nicodemus himself. He was an intelligent hearer, notwithstanding his ignorance regarding the spiritual birth. We wish he had come by day rather than by night, although it has been recently suggested that he went by night because he was in such haste to converse with Jesus that he could not wait until morning. I wish I could fully believe that explanation. But we are glad that he went at all; he stands conspicuous, among the men of his class, for having gone in any circumstances to Jesus Christ.

His Affection for Peter

Remember our Lord's conversation with the woman of Samaria. There they were at Jacob's well, under the burning heat of a Syrian noonday sun. Christ opens his heart in a marvelous way to that woman. He makes a fuller revelation of himself to her than, up to that time, he had ever made to any human being. She said: "I know that Messias cometh (he that is called Christ); when he is come, he will declare unto us all things." Then Jesus uttered this wonderful sentence: "I that speak unto thee am he." To that woman he uttered this other notable truth: "God is a Spirit; and they that worship him must worship in spirit and in truth."

Think how our Lord cared for Peter. Remember the remarkable passage in Luke, the twenty-second chapter and the thirty-first verse. Our Lord said: "Simon, Simon, behold, Satan asked to have you, that he might sift you as wheat." He asked to have all of them; we have the plural there. And then our Lord turns at once and gives us the singular form of the pronoun: "I made supplication for thee." The Lord Jesus turned away from all the disciples, turned away from the whole world for the moment, and, if we may so say, threw his arms around Peter, took Peter to his heart, and lifted Peter in prayer before God. He saw Peter on the edge of a terrible precipice, and he rushed forward, and protected him by his prayer. The familiar version says: "Satan hath desired to have you." The word desired is a very inadequate translation of the Greek. The Revised Version correctly renders it: "Satan asked to have you." He went far beyond a desire. In some mysterious way, as in the case of Job, Satan demanded to have all the disciples for trial. But Peter was especially exposed, and for him Christ, in a personal way, made supplication. This is one of the sweetest touches in the Bible.

When Our Faith Fails

You remember what his prayer was: "I made supplication for thee, that thy faith fail not." For years I had trouble with that verse, because it seemed as if Peter's faith did fail; but lately I received light on this Scripture, as the result of special examination; for I discovered that the Greek word translated "fail not" is not the ordinary Greek word, leipo, but it is ekleipo, the word from which our word eclipse comes; and that what the Lord prayed for was "that thy faith do not utterly, completely fail." That prayer was answered. Peter's faith did partly fail; it failed temporarily; but it did not fail utterly, completely. Christ's prayer was answered, so that he could truly say: "The Father heareth me always." How blessed is that personal element in our relations to Christ! How many times, during the years that we have known each other as pastor and people, some of us may have stood upon terrible precipices, over which we might have gone! It makes one's heart glad and grateful when he thinks of the dangers escaped, because Jesus placed his arms around us, and lifted us up in prayer, saying: "O Father, let not their faith utterly fail."

I have time only to mention our Lord's conversation with the two disciples on the way to Emmaus. He gave in that personal conversation a fuller revelation of himself in the prophecies and in the Psalms than he gave during the three years of his ministry. I have no doubt that much of the teaching found in the Epistles is simply echoes of the conversations of Christ with his disciples, during the forty days between his resurrection and his ascension. Thank God, his love is personal!

An Endless, Perpetual Love

Notice, also, that it is a perpetual love: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." It is perpetual in that it goes backward through the eternities; it also goes forward through the eternities. This is a dateless love. When did it begin? "I have loved thee"—march out on that verb, travel over thousands and thousands and tens of thousands of years, and you will never get to the end of that verb. His love did not begin on the cross; that was the noonday splendor of eternal love. His love did not begin in the carpenter shop; that was the rough manifestation of a love that, like himself, was without beginning and is without ending. His love did not begin in the manger; the manger was the note first heard on earth of a song of eternal love, that had been singing in ages beyond human thought.

It is perpetual, also, so far as the future is concerned. It is the only thing that does abide. We talk of the "everlasting hills"; but they are not everlasting. We talk of "terra firma"; but the earth is not firm. What is the meaning of earthquakes? Why do earthquakes so startle us? Because they are an apparent reversion of all the ordinary laws of life. Nothing on earth abides. God has written across the face of every rock and mountain, "Dust thou art, to dust returnest." All the mountains are growing lower; all the valleys are becoming higher. Some of you remember Ruskin's experiment in the stream that flows from the Mer de Glace, in Chamouni. He dipped a glass into the water, and noticed the amount of powdered granite which settled at the bottom of the glass; then he reckoned the volume of the stream, and the number of thousands of tons of powdered granite that come down annually into the Valley of Chamouni. The quantity was enormous. Continents are changing; one side is becoming depressed, and the other is becoming elevated.

Stand with me a moment at Niagara Falls, and learn again the lesson of the change in all things earthly. Once the Falls were at Lewiston. The river of Niagara is 33 miles long, and the volume of water which enters the river is 280,000 cubic feet each second. It is the common channel of the water of the drainage of Lake Superior, Lake Michigan, Lake Huron, Lake St. Clair and Lake Erie. Once the water from those upper lakes found its way to the sea by other channels. Now it goes through the Niagara River into Lake Ontario. Lake Erie, where the Niagara River leaves it, is 326 feet higher than Lake Ontario, where the Niagara River enters it. Careful calculation shows that on the American side there is a recession every year of six inches; and on the Canadian side, in the Horseshoe Falls, the recession is from three to five feet. If the present degree of recession had been maintained from the beginning, it would have taken seven thousand years for the river to plow its way from Lewiston to the present Falls.

Nature's Law of Change

There have been enormous changes during the ages, and even within a hundred years, by the falling of masses of rock. Table Rock was once a striking feature of the Falls; now it has almost entirely disappeared. In 1818, great masses of rock fell on the American side; and in 1828 and in 1855 still other masses fell from the Horseshoe Falls. Niagara Falls are by no means the highest falls in the world. Victoria Falls, the cataract on the middle Zambesi, in Rhodesia, a few miles below the Kwando Confluence, are much higher. The river is nearly a mile wide at this point, and it suddenly plunges into a chasm 400 feet deep and only 100 to 300 feet wide. Dense clouds of vapor arise; these clouds, as they condense, darken the atmosphere so as to give it the appearance of smoke. This fact has given rise to the native name of the falls, Mosi-wa-Tunya, "Thundering Smoke." This was the name given the falls by Livingstone when he discovered them in 1855.

But Niagara Falls are especially famous for the enormous volume of water which plunges over them on its way to Lake Ontario, and finally to the ocean. Some day there will be no Falls where the Falls now are. There is a bed of Niagara limestone 30 feet deep that the river is wearing away; right beneath it there is a depth of 60 feet of Niagara shale, and beneath that there is a mixture of various materials; the erosion of the shale causes the granite to fall and to crumble, making what geologists call the talus, the heel, a pile of broken stones, and they are constantly wearing away. The day is coming when there will be no Lake Erie. The Falls will have disappeared, and the waters of the lake will pour themselves out, and there will be great cities and rich farms where Lake Erie rolls its waters to-day. God has all eternity at his command; and God, the Artificer of the universe and the Architect of heaven and earth, is hewing out a new heaven and a new earth, wherein shall dwell everlasting righteousness.

All these things are in progress. Nothing abides but God and his love. He is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. Oh, what comfort there is in such a God! Friends come and friends go, children are born and children die. You leaned on your husband, and now he is gone; you trusted in your wife, and now she is gone; in your father and mother, and now they are gone. But God abides, with a heart tenderer than a father's, a pity gentler than a mother's. He whispers, amid all the trials of life: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love."

A MILLION GIVEN TO FIGHT DISEASE

Major Baily K. Ashford
Discoverer of the Hookworm

ONE of the most important campaigns against a disease which has sapped the vitality of tens of thousands is to be inaugurated this fall at the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research in New York City. The physicians and committee in charge are to devise the best and quickest methods for dealing with the "hookworm," which has been discovered to be the cause of a great number of the physical ailments which afflict people who have lived for some time in districts where the sanitary conditions are poor and the climate comparatively warm. The hookworm has been able to increase in numbers and has made its subtle attacks without people being aware of its existence, though they have been painfully conscious of its work on their systems. In all cases, however, until recently, the wasting away, intestinal troubles and lack of energy and force were laid to malaria and various other causes. Now that the worm has been discovered, and its insidious action on the human body studied, it is most probable that the methods to be tested at the institute will prove efficacious in effecting a cure for those afflicted with the disease, and devising means for stamping it out altogether. Physicians are very sanguine that this will be done, as comparatively simple remedies have so far accomplished much toward re-establishing a normal condition in those treated by some of the surgeons connected with our naval and military service.

The funds for this campaign for humanity have been provided by Mr. Rockefeller, who has donated the munificent sum of one million dollars for the purpose. This will probably be ample, and marks a great step forward in specialized philanthropy, where the money is given for a definite purpose and in a sufficient amount to carry it to a successful conclusion, a much better way than starting a good work and leaving it half finished, to be helped along by other philanthropists, or to die of non-support, as has been so often the case with other well-intentioned gifts made for the public benefit.

The hookworm has only been known to medical science since 1899, and its discoverer was a young army surgeon, Lieutenant Baily K. Ashford. He has since been advanced in grade and is now a major. Dr. Ashford was stationed in Porto Rico in 1899, and at the time the great hurricane swept over the island he was one of the most active in alleviating the sufferings of the injured and homeless. The hospitals in Ponce were soon filled to overflowing, and Dr. Ashford established a field hospital, which accommodated 136 patients at a time. Many of these Porto Ricans were supposed to be suffering from hunger or improper diet, but good food and medicines did not seem to build them up, and the doctors were much puzzled. Evidently some unknown disease was draining their vitality. Dr. Ashford, after careful investigation, discovered that their anæmic condition was caused by an infinitesimal worm, which he called the hookworm. Making it a study, he also discovered a simple remedy for the disease, which has proved of great value.

In Porto Rico at least 700,000 people are sufferers from the disease. It is also found in a great many of our own States, where the winters are mild and the poorer people make a practice of going barefoot the larger part of the year. If it is eradicated it will be an incalculable boon to thousands of people who are haggard, worn, lack energy and are "doctoring" without result for a number of diseases, none of which they have got, the hookworm being unknown to most physicians. In this country the worm has been found to enter the body through the pores of the feet. It gets into the blood and travels at will through the body, frequently fastening itself to the lining and minute blood-vessels of the stomach. It sometimes enters the body by way of the mouth. In the membranes of the intestines it forms a poison whose action is most harmful. It multiplies and its ravages, unless stopped by the administration of thymol and salts, will result in the premature aging of the victim and render him an easy prey to pneumonia, typhoid and other diseases, which would be fatal to one in the physical condition of a sufferer from hookworm. When taken in its early stages, it has not been found difficult to effect a cure, and the patient will return to a normal physical condition. Of course there is the constant danger of reinfection unless the sanitary conditions surrounding the patient are improved and shoes worn in summer as well as in winter.

The committee in charge of the scientific investigation of the disease will, it is expected, carry on an active campaign of education against the disease, as well as perfecting remedies for its cure. The physicians believe that when the people in any district in which the disease is found will take the precautions suggested to them the hookworm will be thoroughly eradicated. Physicians all over the country are enthusiastic over the campaign, and it will undoubtedly be watched with interest by the American people, to whom practical philanthropy of this kind makes a strong appeal. Of course, without the hearty co-operation of the people themselves, even so worthy a cause as this will be but partially successful. The suggestions, when sent to any district in which the disease has appeared, should be received in the same friendly spirit in which they are given, and the public should work with the physicians for improved conditions. As a mere matter of dollars and cents, it will be a saving of thousands of dollars to infected localities on account of the generally increased health and the increased earning capacity of hundreds who at present have lost ambition and strength to be active factors in our bustling twentieth century life, where the "battle," perhaps more than at any other time in history, "is to the strong."

Incidentally it might be mentioned that the Orient has long been a sufferer from hookworm, and Asiatic laborers have brought the disease to Hawaii and to California. There have been hundreds of cases treated in the city of San Francisco alone. The work there is under the charge of Dr. Herbert Gunn. The disease first appeared there about four years ago. Thousands of laborers have been imported from the West Indies to work on the sugar plantations in Hawaii. So many were attacked by the disease that this plan of saving labor had to be abandoned. Many a man has been accused of being lazy when the small parasite was the real cause of his failure as a workman.

The Hookworm as It Appears Under the Microscope

EVERLASTING LOVE

Sermon by Robert Stuart MacArthur

It is a powerful love. This last thought is to me a very sweet one: "With loving kindness have I drawn thee." Power is in God, power is in truth, power is in love. The Gospel has won through all the ages. Nothing was wanting to give the cause of Christianity the appearance of helpless and hopeless weakness when the Great Commission was given by Christ to his disciples on the unknown mountain in Galilee. If he were not divine, he must have been insane when that command was given. These men were commissioned to conquer the world for their Lord and Master. They were without an army, without a sword, without money, and without any of the munitions of war. Could any project possibly be more hopeless? How could these men overcome the forces of evil, hoary with age and wise with practice? How could they overturn the Academy in Athens and the Capitol at Rome? How could they reach the barbarians in surrounding countries? Was ever a project so utterly unlikely of accomplishment? It is not, therefore, too much to say that either divinity or insanity must have marked the leader of such an enterprise. What was the result? Away over the rocky hills of Palestine went these preachers of the cross; away over the waters of the sparkling Ægean went the preachers of this sublime evangel. The islands of the archipelago became the stepping-stones for the feet of the "sacramental host of God's elect." Soon Paul is preaching to the Athenians, with Mars Hill as his pulpit. Soon the messengers of the cross are in Rome. From Paul's prison cell, in the Eternal City, went out truths that have girdled the world. With the cross as their only weapon, the evangelists overthrew the ancient philosophies of Greece and the heathen mythologies of Rome.

Wonderful are the words of the apostle Paul, when he said in Rom. 1:16, "For I am not ashamed of the Gospel: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." We should have been perfectly satisfied to take the apostle's words at their face value, even if he had not assigned a reason for his desire to preach the Gospel in Rome. But he gives this reason with the utmost fulness of statement. He declares that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation. A wonderful word is this Greek word translated power. It is the word from which our word dynamite comes.

The Gospel of Christ is the remedy for all the ills of humanity. It is the hope of civilization in all the broad ranges of its influence. It is the mightiest deterrent from sin; it is the divinest impulsion toward righteousness. It is the inspiration to all that is noblest in science, literature and art. The mightiest force known among men is love. Love is stronger than logic; love is irresistible among men. You can love men into the kingdom of God. But the sublimest love known to men or angels is the love of God in Jesus Christ our Lord. The sweetest song which ever echoed through the ages is the song of God's personal, perpetual and powerful love, as heard from his own august and gracious lips: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee."

The New York Bible Society Celebrates Its Hundredth Year of Bible Distribution

Giving Bibles to Canal-boat Dwellers

A Missionary Giving Bibles to Young Polish Immigrants

Distributing Bibles on Shipboard

OF the many centennial anniversaries observed during the present year few possess more general interest for Christian people than the one to be celebrated December 3 in Carnegie Hall, New York, in recognition of the one hundredth birthday of the New York Bible Society. Although local in name and in its direct field of work, few religious organizations have more widespread influence than this society. While its distribution of the Scriptures is limited to the "city and harbor of New York," the dissemination of its output is really world-wide.

The society's object is to distribute God's Book among all sorts and classes in the city, among immigrants of every race passing through Ellis Island, and among the crews of vessels of every description in the harbor. Bibles are freely supplied to hundreds of ministers and a large number of missionaries and other workers, who visit the needy in homes, hospitals, prisons and other institutions. The value of such ministry to the convicts in the city prisons cannot be overestimated. Many a lad behind the bars for his first offense receives a Gospel or a Testament, with a kind word of helpful explanation and exhortation from the chaplain on his daily rounds, and is saved from a life of crime. Men and women, nauseated with the experiences of long years of wickedness, break down and confess their sins to God. Letters have been received from men, telling of their gratitude for the message which brought to them a new hope and a new purpose in life. Many a sick man or woman in hospital or tenement has been cheered, many an aged one comforted and strengthened, by a gift of the Word of Life. Indeed, and often, through the perusal of the Testament, patients have learned to love a new-found Saviour and Friend.

A missionary was recently visiting the City Hospital on Blackwell's Island, going from bed to bed, giving a Gospel or Testament to those who were anxious for the Word of God. One day she carried some apples and oranges and other delicacies in her basket. An old Irish woman said to her, "Have ye the Book?" She was more anxious to receive the "Book" than to get the orange. Bibles are distributed free of cost to those who cannot afford to pay anything, and to others at cost or less. No book is ever sold at a profit.

Ellis Island is doubtless the most important point of distribution. More than 700,000 immigrants came by way of this port of entry during the past year, about 40,000 remaining in New York City, the others going to various States of the Union. These immigrants come, in most cases, from lands where church and State are one, and an open Bible free to all is an unexpected phase of the liberty they have come to seek. Sometimes professing Christians, who have never owned or been permitted to read the Bible, laugh with joy at their first gift in the new land. A young Russian who landed at Ellis Island was handed a Testament in his own language, became converted through reading it, and is now attending school and preparing for the ministry. One of the annual contributors to the society is a man who landed, a stranger from Sweden, many years ago; one of the agents gave him a Testament in his own language. The man went West, and is now a prosperous farmer in Nebraska, sending each year a donation, that other immigrants may be blessed as he was. "There can be no question as to the true value of Bible reading and study," said Governor Brooks of Wyoming the other day, in a letter to the general secretary of the society. "In the West, particularly, it is imperative that our spiritual development keep even pace with our great material progress, and this can only be accomplished by a careful study of the Bible and thorough understanding of the great lessons inculcated therein."

A Swede was recently coming into our country through Ellis Island. As he landed Mr. Jackson stepped up to him, offering him a Swedish New Testament. The Swede stopped, apparently startled, and stared at the missionary saying, "Weren't you here twenty-six years ago? I think you are the same man—yes, you are the same man. I remember you. Twenty-six years ago I landed here a stranger, and you gave me a New Testament in the Swedish language, just as you offered me one now. I read it, and through reading it I became a Christian. After a few years I made up my mind to become a preacher, and for twenty years I have been preaching the Gospel in Colorado. It all began in your giving me a New Testament." A multitude of people all over our country give thanks for the Scriptures they have received from the New York Bible Society. Not only are Bibles sent by way of Ellis Island to every corner of the land, but through the Marine Society they find their way to every port of the world. It is said that there is no port which does not send ships to New York, and it is the business of the agent for this department of the work, Rev. William G. Jones, to visit all the vessels within the harbor. Mr. Jones has been for thirty-five years an enthusiastic worker for the society, not only leaving Bibles and Testaments among sailors, but giving counsel and sympathy to seamen who are ill, homesick or discouraged. These men go to the ends of the earth, having received from his hand a copy of the Word of Life. Many a man or a lad, awakening from a drunken stupor to find himself robbed and stripped and lying in the gutter, has been led by this never-tiring missionary back to health and good habits and into a Christian faith, and now holds a good position on a sailing vessel.

When the steamer Roosevelt sailed on the Arctic expedition she had on board twenty-one volumes of Scripture, a gift from the New York Bible Society. During the past summer, application was made for two hundred Gospels to put aboard of vessels from India lying in this harbor.

When the Immigrant Lands He Is Greeted with the Bible

The original New York Bible Society was organized December 4, 1809, and the present New York Bible Society was organized in 1823, as an auxiliary thereof, under the name of the Young Men's New York Bible Society. In 1839, the latter adopted the name of the original society (which had ceased to exist), and was incorporated in 1866. There has been no interruption of the work from 1809 to the present day. The board of managers is composed of sixty men of the leading churches of the various denominations of the city, and the work is strictly unsectarian. Headquarters of the society is at 66 Bible House, the centre from which Bibles are sent out and from which emanate the plans for practical work as directed by the general secretary, Rev. George W. Carter, Ph.D.

The meeting on Friday evening, December 3, promises to be of rare interest. Governor John Franklin Fort of New Jersey will give the principal address. The following Sunday, December 5, will be observed by pastors generally throughout the city as Bible Sunday. Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D.D., will deliver the centennial sermon in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church. Letters have been received from nearly every Governor in the United States and from Attorney-General Wickersham of Washington, and other high government officials, endorsing the need of wider knowledge of the Bible and the efficiency of the New York Bible Society in meeting such need.

"I know of no more useful chart and compass for immigrants intending to become citizens of this republic than the Bible," writes the Secretary of the Interior, "and I heartily commend your efforts at its distribution in this respect."

Hon. James Bryce, the British Ambassador, writes: "I wish to join in expressing my high sense of the importance—which was never greater than it is to-day—of maintaining a knowledge of the Bible in all classes of the community."

Many other distinguished men wrote in the same vein, praising the work of the society.

STRANGE AMULETS OF THE ORIENT

By DR. SAMUEL M. ZWEMER

The Famous Missionary and Traveler

ONE of the real hindrances to the spread of the Gospel and to simple faith in Jesus Christ among Moslems is the burden of groveling superstition which rests upon so many hearts. The widespread illiteracy of the Moslem world, including from eighty to ninety per cent. of the whole population, is a constant stimulus to all forms of childish credulity. One of the most common forms of superstition is the use of amulets, called in Arabic Hama' Il, Ta' Widh, Hijab or Azeemah.

The use of amulets is almost universal in the Moslem world from Sierra Leone to Java, and men of intelligence and education in Turkey and Egypt are still often the slaves to this custom, which, doubtless, like so many other things in Islam, was borrowed from Judaism. Yet the words talisman and amulet are both derived from the Arabic language.

All sorts of things are used as amulets in Arabia, and their use is justified by the saying of Mohammed himself (Mishkat, 21:1): "There is no wrong in using charms and spells so long as you do not associate anything with God." The most common things used as amulets are a small Koran suspended in a silver case; words from the Koran written on paper and carried in a leather receptacle; the names of Allah or their numerical value; the names of Mohammed and his companions; precious stones with or without inscriptions; beads; old coins; clay images; the teeth of wild animals; holy earth from Mecca or Kerbela in the shape of tiny bricks, or in small bags. When the Kaaba covering at Mecca is taken down each year and renewed the old cloth is cut up into small pieces and sold for charms.

The women in Mecca use an amulet of special power called "Mishkash," which is supposed to exercise its virtue for the increase of the family. The "Mishkash" is really a copy of an old Venetian coin, representing the Duke of Venice kneeling before St. Mark on the one side, and on the other side is the image of Christ surrounded by stars. Of course the women themselves are in total ignorance of the inscription on the coin and of its Christian character.

Amulets and charms are worn not only by the Arabs themselves and to protect their children from the evil eye, but are put over the doors of their dwellings and even on camels, donkeys, horses, fishing boats; in fact, anywhere, to ward off danger or death.

According to the principles of Islam only verses from the Koran should be used, but the door of superstition once being set ajar by Mohammed himself, as we know from the story of his life, it is now wide open. The chapters from the Koran which are most often selected for use as amulets and put in the little cases shown in the picture are Surahs i, vi, xviii, xxxvi, xliv, lv, lxvii, and lxxviii. There are five verses in the Koran called the verses of protection, "Ayat-el-Hifdh," which are most powerful to defend from evil. They read as follows: "The preservation of heaven and earth is no burden unto Him"; "God is the best protector"; "They guard him by the command of God"; "We guard him from every stoned devil"; "A protection from every rebellious devil." These verses are written with great care and with a special kind of ink by those who deal in amulets, and are then sold for a good price to Moslem women and children. The ink used for writing amulets is saffron water, rose water, orange water, the juice of onions, water from the sacred well of Zem Zem, and sometimes even human blood. It is very important that the one who writes the amulet be a holy man in the Moslem sense of that word. We are told in Arabic books on the subject, and these books are printed by the thousands, e. g., "The diet of the one who prepares charms depends on the kind of names of God which he intends to write or recite. If they are the terrible attributes of Allah, then he must refrain from the use of meat, fish, eggs, honey, and musk. If they are His amiable attributes, he must abstain from butter, curds, vinegar, salt, and ambergris."

There is a whole science of amulets, exorcism, and Moslem witchcraft. One of the learned men of Bahrein some years ago gave me the standard work on the subject, which has run to many editions. It is by Abu-Abbas Al-Bouni. One of the talismans taken from this book, together with its translation, is shown in the picture. It is interesting to observe the form of the cross in the circle, with the fourfold repetition: "In the name of God, the merciful and gracious." There are many traces of Christian influence in the later development of Mohammedanism, and the use of the cross as a symbol to ward off evil is one of them.

Among the Shiah Moslems, whom we meet everywhere in East Arabia, the most common amulet is called Nadi-Ali. It consists generally of a lead or silver plate with little bells at the bottom, inscribed with these words:

> Cry aloud to Ali; he is the possessor of wonders.
> From him you will find help from trouble.
> He takes away very quickly all grief and anxiety
> By the mission of Mohammed and his own sanctity.

There are innumerable cases where such amulets are used for the cure of disease. The native doctors firmly believe that when every other remedy fails the book of Allah, if properly administered, internally or externally, will drive away pain and cure the patient.

We must not think that this belief in the power of talismans and amulets is a thing of the past. From one end of the Moslem world to the other, there is still unquestioning faith in the power of such religious magic. Prof. MacDonald in his recent book, The Religious Attitude and Life in Islam, says:

"Scattered among the educated classes, it is true, you will meet a good deal of absolute Voltairean unbelief, but even these individuals are liable to set back at any time. The shell that separates the Oriental from the unseen is still very thin, and the charms or amulet of the magician may easily break it. The world of the Arabian Nights is still his world, and these stories for him are not tales from wonderland, but are, rather, to be compared to our stories of the wonders and possibilities of science, such as M. Jules Verne used to write and which we now owe to Mr. H. G. Wells."

The fact is that ordinary things often seem very extraordinary to people brought up in ignorance, as are the Arabs, and so many of the Moslems. To the average Moslem the game which children play of telling a person to take a number and perform divers operations with it, with the result of telling one his age, would seem to involve direct contact with the spirit world. The numerical value of numbers in the Arabic language is used to form all sorts of magic squares, and this sort of hocus-pocus passes for religious learning among the masses.

The traveling derwishes grow rich in trading upon the superstition of the common people, and it is strange that people who are so credulous to believe everything connected in any way with their own prophet and book should be unwilling to accept the testimony of the Gospel and believe in the great miracle of the Incarnation.

Fear of death and of a judgment after death makes them all their lifetime subject to bondage. We must pray that the veil of ignorance may be removed and that speedily the Name which is above every name may so rule in the hearts of men, women and children that all other names shall lose their power.

The hospitals and the book-shops of our mission will doubtless in time drive out the use of amulets in East Arabia, and the march of civilization, with its modern scientific miracles and spirit of investigation, is also a means to that end. Nevertheless, I have known of cases where printed Arabic gospels were bought to be used as amulets and where patients tried to rub off ink from the printed paper used to wrap powders in at the hospital in order to drink the solution as a remedy!

Amulets in Silver and Gilt

That on the upper right hand is in book form to hold texts from the Koran. The vase-like amulets are used in the temples. The cup-like amulets are for holding precious stones.

A Talisman from a Moslem Book on Amulets

Translation: "In the name of Allah the Merciful, the Compassionate. Truly Thou wilt preserve the one who carries this writing of mine from the evil of all that might harm him and Thou wilt appoint over him its angels and servants and assistants who are entrusted with its service and guard him by day and by night. Mohammed is the Apostle of Allah and those with him are stronger than the unbelievers. Among them are merciful ones whom we see bowing and kneeling seeking kindness from Allah and favor. Their marks are on their faces, the effect of prostration, and that is their likeness in the Pentateuch and the Gospel."

THE STORY BIBLE ∽ By Margaret E. Sangster

THERE is no more sadly neglected duty among parents to-day than that of imparting to their children a knowledge of the Bible. There is no more grievous lack in religious literature than that of books intended to impart such knowledge. We are convinced that talent—if not genius—of the highest order is essential to acceptable authorship of such books. The vast majority of books of Bible stories are either so vapid that children do not like them, or else so inaccurate that parents cannot approve of them. In the circumstances we are glad to have found a book of Bible stories which we can recommend almost entirely without qualification.

It is called The Story Bible, and is by Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster. She has arranged the stories in their accustomed Biblical sequence, so that later they may introduce their readers to the Bible itself. With the simplicity of much literary skill Mrs. Sangster has given us a volume of vivid and dramatic tales. The author is evidently not afraid of the supernatural, but perhaps she shows most her wisdom in exact Biblical quotation whenever a controverted point is touched. Nor is she afraid of words; the book has no kinship with those literary monstrosities, "stories in one syllable," although it is in the main written in terse Anglo-Saxon. That the author could in some measure show us "The Green Hill Far Away" without insertion of gruesome details is one of the greatest recommendations of the book; almost as valuable is the chapter on "The First Easter."—The Pacific Baptist

We will send this superbly illustrated "Story Bible (490 pages, large bold type, bound in purple and gold); our famous "Dreamland" Art Calendar for 1910, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD weekly for one whole year (all three) for only $2.00.

The Football Tragedies

EVERY year the papers of the country record a large number of fatal accidents on the football gridiron, and the injuring and maiming for life of promising young men who had every prospect of a successful career before them, fortified as they were with almost superabundant health and energy to back the mental culture of the colleges. This year the record of tragedies has been growing from the first week of the football season, and as the game will be played until snow flies, probably many more names will be added to the already long list.

One of the most pathetic scenes in the history of West Point was recently enacted at the post cemetery, when the cadet corps marched to the hillside and laid away one of their number who, three days before, had been one of the most active and popular players on the Academy team. In a game with an Eastern university, the young man's neck was broken. No blame could be laid on any individual. Both sides were playing a clean game, and observing all the rules in an honorable way; it was the game itself which was at fault. Unless it is modified in some way, the game may be forbidden at many of our institutions of mingled brawn and learning. It is reported in the public press that the West Point authorities have canceled all games on the Academy schedule for this year. Whether the game will be sanctioned next year is an open question.

Young men must have healthful sports and recreation. Often the best students are rated among the best athletes, and as they receive both physical and mental training they are apt to be more successful in after life than the student who insisted on "burning the midnight oil" and did nothing for the magnificent machine we call the human body and which is worthy the most careful consideration and development. Football, however, in its present form is a menace to life and limb; a hard physical strain, which the players feel after the excitement of the season has worn away. If it cannot be made less like a gladiatorial combat in a Roman arena, it will have to be abolished on the demand of the parents. If it can be modified so that there is no more danger than in America's strenuous national game, baseball, it will probably be played for years to come. Both parents and university authorities should take action and see that something is done one way or the other.

The War on the Hookworm

MEDICAL science affirms that the parasite known as the hookworm, which is afflicting some two million people in this country at the present time, can be eradicated and its victims thoroughly cured. Mr. John D. Rockefeller's gift of a million dollars for a campaign against this new enemy of the general health is therefore a most timely and practical one. Its ravages are not confined to any particular section, but are heard from East, South and West. California reports hundreds of cases, evidently imported from the Orient, and it is probable that the West Indies are responsible for a large proportion of the others. The parasite abounds in infected water, uncooked vegetables, marshes and swamp lands. It is a menace to health, sapping vigor, robbing its victims of energy and the will to work, and ultimately producing emaciation, general weakness and death. If such conditions can be overcome by medical science, and the cause removed or rendered impotent for evil, the anti-hookworm crusade will be as great a public blessing as those that have been so skilfully waged against consumption and the fever-breeding mosquito.

Mixed in Faith

WHEN Cardinal Antonelli died, his will contained these words: "Before anything else, I commend my poor soul to the infinite mercy of God, trusting that through the intercession of the most holy immaculate Mary, and of my patron saints, St. Peter, St. Paul, St. James and St. Louis, he may grant me remission of my sins and make me worthy of the eternal glory of Paradise." The poor cardinal did not, apparently, expect salvation "by One, Jesus Christ," but by five, and Jesus Christ was not mentioned as one of them. What a pity that the three apostles and the French king left no room for Jesus in the thoughts of the dying man! And what a pity that many, who are not cardinals, are just as far from trusting solely for salvation to the "one Mediator between God and man." How many are like Olaf, the first Norse king who professed Christianity, of whom the chroniclers say that he was "mixed in his faith." In peace, he prayed to Christ; but when he waxed hot in battle, he usually called upon Thor and Odin.

Old writers call such people "duty-faith men," because they build their hope on a foundation formed partly by faith in their own works and partly by faith in Christ.

Dangerous Foundations

WHEN the Criminal Courts Building, in Centre Street, New York, was finished, a few years ago, the builders are said to have had such confidence in their work that they declared the great stone structure "would last forever." Its site was the famous Collect Pond of earlier days, which gave the builders of the old and the new Tombs Prison much trouble by reason of the instability of the foundation. The operation of the Subway, with its continuous vibration, showed the folly of building a huge stone edifice upon piles above an insecure bottom. Great fissures have appeared in the walls of the Courts Building, and its general condition is such that, being a menace to life and surrounding property, it has been abandoned. A hundred policemen now surround it, to warn off pedestrians and direct street traffic to safer thoroughfares. This is part of the heavy price the big city pays for progress, and it is also a striking illustration of the folly of building upon a bad foundation. If the city officials or the builders had heeded the warnings in the good old Book, they could not have made such a mistake. "More Gospel and less graft" would be a good motto for any municipality.

President Taft and Woman Suffrage

AMONG the many speeches which the President has made during his transcontinental tour, one which he delivered recently in the South will specially gladden the hearts of the woman suffragists. Surrounded on the campus of a Mississippi woman's college by eight hundred bright young girls, he said that, while he was not a rabid suffragist, he would be in favor of the suffrage for women when he was convinced that the women really wanted it. "When they desire it," he said, "I am in favor of giving it to them; and when they desire it they will get it, too. But I do believe that one of the advantages in giving them that kind of influence will be to open more avenues of self-support to them than has heretofore been done. The great trouble has been that we have not given the women a fair show. We have not opened all the avenues to livelihood that they are quite as able to fill as we, and, in certain respects, better than we." These are brave, outspoken words. Hereafter, the women of America have a right to count Mr. Taft as an ally. He may yet prove to be a very serviceable one.

The Christian Science Schism

SINCE Christian Science was first launched as a full-fledged cult there has been no break in the ranks of the faithful so serious as that which has taken place recently. Two prominent "readers," one in New York and the other in Brooklyn, each with an influential following, undertook to defy the authority of the central organization and to establish a new Christian Science Church of their own. "Mother" Eddy promptly applied the discipline and practically read the two leading rebels out of the organization, on the ground that they had been teaching and practising contrary to the principles of the Christian Science faith and creed. To the outside world, with its varied beliefs, the incident would have seemed unimportant but for certain remarkable subsequent developments, which reveal an extraordinary condition of affairs among Christian Scientists. One of the accused leaders is a brilliant, clever woman, who has long been regarded as a favorite lieutenant of the founder. She is said to have indulged in wild vagaries that recall those of Schlatter, the Western "healer" of some years ago, who at one time claimed to be divine. Indeed, she outdid Schlatter, for she not only claimed divinity for herself, but for the founder as well. Mother Eddy, she declared, was God manifest, and she herself was Jesus manifest. Witnesses state that on one occasion she gathered twenty-six of her followers at a so-called "Paschal feast," at which she broke bread and, distributing it, told her astonished adherents that they were in the same mental attitude as the disciples at the Last Supper. She is said to have concluded with the startling declaration: "I am the Christ." We hesitate to believe such a story, and it is only fair to add that it has been absolutely denied. Meanwhile, the warfare between the two antagonistic wings promises to be lively, for a season at least.

GENERAL NOTES

—PRESIDENT TAFT, we understand, invariably turns down his glass at banquets and similar functions, and sticks to plain water. This well-known peculiarity encouraged one of his auditors at a big gathering in a Western city, a few days ago, to ask the President what he thought of prohibition. Mr. Taft looked at his questioner with a quizzical smile and then replied that he was reminded of the case of the lion and certain other wild animals who asked the fox to decide a dispute among them. Reynard listened to the evidence thoughtfully, and then replied: "Friends, I have caught a severe cold recently and have completely lost the sense of smell." When the audience ceased laughing, Mr. Taft proceeded with his usual address on general topics. Few men have an easier way of escaping the interrogator's hook than our amiable President.

—THE RESULT OF the recent election in New York City is gratifying to the great majority of citizens, who have long hoped and striven for some check to be applied to official rapacity and corruption. The new Board of Estimate and Apportionment, which takes office in January, is composed of a body of men who will hold the public purse-strings more tightly and regulate expenditures more judiciously than has been the case in recent years. But in New York, as in all other great cities, the forces of corruption, no matter how severely defeated, will rally and, by plotting and plodding, will somehow ultimately contrive to regain their lost power unless the people are active and their leaders able and sagacious as well as far-seeing. Eternal vigilance is the price of good municipal government in these days.

—IN A RECENT ADDRESS Rev. Dr. James M. Gray, speaking of the noise made by the anti-Bible critics, used this pertinent illustration: "General Grant relates that when he was a lieutenant he was one day traveling on horseback, with a brother lieutenant, across our Western prairies. A sound of wolves was heard, and his companion, more familiar with the habits of those animals than he, asked how many he thought were in the pack. Grant really believed there were about 150, but fearing too extravagant a guess, he replied nonchalantly, 'a dozen.' By and by they reached a hillock, from which the animals could be seen, when it was discovered that there were but two." There are ministers to-day who, like Grant, judge of the weight and influence of some of these university professors by the attention they create, and so, multiplying their numbers and magnifying their importance beyond bounds, echo their vagaries to the injury of their own hearers.

Wins Vanderbilt Cup

IN the great automobile race on Long Island, on October 30, for the Vanderbilt cup, Harry F. Grant, of Boston, was successful. He drove the American Locomotive Company's 6-cylinder, 60-horse-power Alco car over the track, a distance of 278.8 miles, in 4 hours 25 minutes and 42 seconds, averaging a little under 63 miles an hour. E. H. Parker, of New York City, drove the Fiat Automobile Company's 4-cylinder, 45-horse-power Fiat, and was second in 4 hours 38 minutes and 58 3-5 seconds, averaging a little less than 60 miles an hour. The race was the fifth competition for the great silver challenge trophy first offered by Mr. William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., in 1904, when it was won by George Heath in a Panhard. The second race, in 1905, was won by Hemery in a Darracq; and the third race, in 1906, was captured by Louis Wagner in another Darracq. There was no contest in 1907, and last year the cup was secured by George Robertson, who averaged 64.4 miles an hour for the distance, with the 90-horse-power Locomobile he piloted. Grant was as low as seven in the list at one time, but he kept crawling toward the front until he came out the winner. Grant is a comparatively new man in the road-racing brigade. He drove his first road race on Labor Day of last year. Before that time and since he has been employed as a demonstrator of the Alco car in Boston. Mr. Vanderbilt also awarded some other prizes to those who had won singular successes in other contests. Sir Thomas Lipton, with many other leaders in the social and business world, occupied places on the grand stand, and though the weather was bitter cold these spectators kept themselves in good humor and were wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement as the race continued and neared its close. The Bible constantly illustrates spiritual truth with the practical affairs of life. Paul appears at his best when he compares the Christian life with a battle or a race. The automobiles were in a race which all but one had to lose, but in the spiritual contest in which we are engaged all may win, securing the prize of personal honor here and the crown of immortality hereafter.

Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. (1. Cor. 9:24.)

Fake Sermons

There is a vacant pulpit in a city of the Middle West, and the members of the church invited candidates to preach in it on trial. Two of the candidates preached the same sermon, word for word, on successive Sundays, and the members of the congregation were surprised, amused and disgusted. It seems that there is a syndicate, and possibly a number of syndicates, which sell to ministers sermons prepared by them entire from exordium to peroration. These ministers, no doubt by mistake, had secured copies of the same manuscript, or they each may have purloined the material from some written volume of sermons. This coincidence has called to public attention the mistake and evil of such use of sermons. Neither of those men applying was fit for that or any other pulpit. They practised deceit, and did it intentionally. The audience had every reason to believe that it was listening to honest men, preaching sermons which they had prepared, and the men themselves were applying for the responsibilities of the pastorate upon the strength of the ability and integrity of which their messages were the exponent. God is the only being in the universe who is original. His creatures are all borrowers, more or less. There are few persons in any profession who are relatively original. It is only the fool who thinks he can grow or serve without appropriating the ideas of others. While the word education indicates the drawing out of that which is within a person, the other half of the meaning is putting the thoughts of others into the mind. There is an honest appropriation of the thoughts and opinions of others, assimilated by care, study and industry, and then there is a thoroughly dishonest pilfering of the thoughts of others in the same words, which is excusable nowhere, but is wicked and contemptible in the pulpit. Sermon syndicates are all wrong, and he steals most from himself who uses the thoughts of others as a substitute for study, careful preparation, and the earnest message of God's minister to dying souls. He may have paid his price to the syndicate, but he has practised a fraud upon those who trusted him, and he has impoverished his own personal integrity.

Provide things honest in the sight of all men. (Rom. 12:17.)

Killed in Football Game

Eugene A. Byrne, left tackle of the Army football team, was fatally hurt in the football game at West Point with the team from Harvard University. Byrne, who comes from Buffalo, was acting as captain for the West Pointers for the day, and played hard and effectively throughout. The halves were each twenty-five minutes long and about twelve minutes of the second half had been played when Byrne received his injury. There came a sharp compact plunge against the left side of West Point's line, in which Minot, the Harvard fullback, carried the ball. The play came at Byrne, and he dived to stop it; when the scrimmage untangled Byrne was stretched out, paralyzed, on the ground. His neck had been broken, and he lived but a few hours. His father witnessed the accident, and his mother was brought from Buffalo as soon as the train could carry her.

The cadet was buried with military honors. The accident immediately stopped the game, and cast a dark shadow over West Point, and over the ball games of the country. There is a very general demand for such a change in the rules of football as will materially reduce its danger to life and limb. Two other men were killed in games in different parts of the country the day young Byrne was injured. There is no advantage which this sport can bring to the development of a vigorous manhood or to the training of a soldier which can atone for the physical injuries and deaths which have followed as the result. These precious lives are too dear a price to pay for the fun or physical benefit which the contest supplies. The rashness and brutality of American athletics are unnecessary, and an end should be put to them by the proper authorities at once. That there is no malice and no wrong moral intentions does not atone for the sudden ending of noble lives and for the sorrow that fills so many homes. Life is too sacred a trust to be thrown away. Satan, the father of lies, said this truth:

All that a man hath will he give for his life. (Job 2:4.)

Pirates' Treasure Uncovered

After the severe storm which recently swept the coast of Yucatan, Mexico, the beach at Puerto Celestun sparkled with many coins of gold and silver, of English and Spanish make, bearing dates of the early part of the last century. The crews of fishing boats picked up thousands of dollars of them. A long time ago the pirate Lafitte buried his stolen fortune in a secret place. It is said he killed the servants that hid it for him, that no mortal but him should know its location. It is thought by some that the fingers of the sea pulled away the soil, broke open the chest, and tossed the pieces of gold and silver, which he buried on the beach, into other hands. Neither the pirate nor philanthropist can carry his coins with him over the silent river. The hand of death tosses them on the beach, to be picked up by other fingers. The only way that money can be carried with us into the other life is to invest it here in this world in the enterprises of justice, mercy and love, in honor of the heavenly Father and the welfare of our fellow-men. The action of the pirate of Yucatan was in harmony with the custom of olden times of hiding wealth in secret places. The prophet Isaiah makes reference to this custom.

I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places. (Isa. 45:3.)

Prosperous Ireland

At the invitation of John Redmond, a delegation visited Ireland recently. Captain Edward O'Meager Condon and John O'Callaghan, national secretary of the United Irish Society, were the committee of visitation. They spent more than a month among the Irish cities observing present-day conditions in Ireland. "Ireland is beginning to see the dawn of prosperous times," said Captain Condon. About one-half of the tenant farmers are now land-owners. The mud hovel is disappearing, and the people are practically unanimous in supporting the Irish Parliamentary party. "The Irish have not lost sight of their great aim, and home rule and nothing else is still the battlecry." The Green Isle, with its fertility and witchery of beauty, has stood out in marked contrast to the unhappiness and stationariness of its civilization, and the marked improvement that these visitors discovered in individual conditions and governmental prospect is a cause of congratulation to every Irishman throughout the world and to every friend of his fellowman. In the providence of God all nations and governments seem to be improving. The atmosphere of our time, vitalized by the breath of Christ, is giving new life to the institutions of liberty and love. Ireland, so long languid, seems to be catching this breath of God and is being inspired with new life and hope.

O, Lord, I beseech thee, send now prosperity. (Psa. 118:25.)

Wanted His Grave

Simon Ratkowsky died recently, leaving his creditors unsatisfied. Some of them were so relentless that, finding no assets in the city of the living, they went out to the city of the dead and tried to take the grave in which he rested as a settlement of his claim. The lot in the cemetery was all that the dead man had, and they undertook to levy on the property and take a title in their own name. Surrogate Thomas, of New York, decided that the plot in which he is buried cannot be sold to pay his debts. He says that as the whole plot is part of a cemetery, and is actually in use as a place for the interment of the dead, it is exempt from sale. We have read pitiful stories of the foreclosures of mortgages, and the bankruptcy of worthy persons who have been unfortunate; but the cold proposition to oust a man's body from its grave and take it in the settlement of a claim is the limit of littleness and meanness. We do not justify the failure of a man to make every possible effort to pay his debts, but our hearts revolt at the petty and mean spirit that would dig up the body of the dead to satisfy his claims. A pound of flesh seems bad enough, but this pound of bones demanded seems even worse. Christ's rebuke of the creditor who was unduly severe in the collection of his claim is pronounced.

But the same servant went out, and found one of his fellow servants, which owed him an hundred pence: and he laid hands on him and took him by the throat, saying, Pay me that thou owest. And his fellow servant fell down at his feet, and besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. And he would not: but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay the debt. (Matt. 18:28-30.)

THE BATTLE OF THE BALLOTS

Hon. Eben S. Draper
Re-elected Governor of Massachusetts

Hon. W. J. Gaynor
Mayor-elect of New York

Hon. W. H. Mann
Elected Governor of Virginia

Hon. Aram Pothier
Re-elected Governor of Rhode Island

FOR the country, as a whole, this is an "off year" in elections. Three of the most important States, however, elected Governors, and several mayoralty contests were of national interest, notably the hard-fought campaign in New York City. Now that the battle of ballots is over, and the shouting has died away, Massachusetts, Virginia and Rhode Island know who will be their chief executives for the coming term.

Massachusetts elects a Governor every year. Consequently, politics is always of vital interest to the people, and one campaign is hardly over before the party leaders are planning for the next. It is the custom in the Bay State to give a Governor two renominations for the gubernatorial office, and, unlike the Vice-Presidency, the Lieutenant-Governor is always in the line of direct promotion to the Governorship.

Hon. Eben S. Draper has been re-elected for another term. His administration seems to have been satisfactory to a majority of voters, and His Excellency, as the Governor of Massachusetts is officially called, has the respect of all parties for his integrity and honesty of purpose.

Mr. Draper is one of the largest manufacturers of his State, and believes in a careful business administration. Though he had a wealthy father, he decided to know thoroughly the business which was one day to be his, and after leaving the Massachusetts Institute of Technology did practical work in machine shops and cotton mills. He has long taken an active part in politics, and in 1896 was one of the strongest supporters of the "gold standard" resolution. He has been a delegate several times to Presidential conventions. He has been Lieutenant-Governor of the State. The family has been noted in public life, his brother having been a member of Congress and Ambassador to Italy. Lieutenant-Governor Louis O. Frothingham was re-elected.

Rhode Island re-elected its present Governor, Hon. Aram J. Pothier. His administration has evidently been popular, for he was returned by a greatly increased majority. Three constitutional amendments were up for the consideration of the voters, and they were all carried. One of these confers the veto power on the Governor, a power which has long been enjoyed by practically all the Governors of the States. The Lieutenant-Governor is Hon. Zenas W. Bliss.

Hon. William Hodges Mann, the Democratic nominee in Virginia, was elected. The new Governor is a lawyer and has served on the bench of his native State. The Lieutenant-Governor-elect is Hon. J. Taylor Ellyson.

The city of New York undergoes an almost total political revolution as the result of the November elections. Judge William J. Gaynor, the nominee of the Tammany Democracy, is elected Mayor by 72,500 plurality, being the only important candidate on the Tammany ticket who has escaped defeat. The Fusionists, a combination of Republicans and Independents, elect all the other candidates of importance, including the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, which practically controls the purse-strings of the municipality. The expenditure of vast sums of money and the distribution of patronage heretofore controlled by Tammany will now be under the direction of men who are pledged to economy and far-reaching administrative reforms. The new Mayor is also pledged to conduct a reform administration. Judge Gaynor, the Mayor-elect, is a native of Oneida County, New York, fifty-nine years of age, and has lived in Brooklyn thirty-six years. He has been prominent as a lawyer and active in political reform movements for many years. He has been a Judge of the Supreme Court since 1893, when he was elected by independent Democrats and Republicans. In 1894 he declined the Democratic nomination for Governor of New York.

Alice Roosevelt Longworth as an Angel of Mercy

IN the Anti-Tuberculosis Movement in Ohio, the League has had no more energetic and successful helper than Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth. She has not only been personally active, but she has enlisted many of her friends in this humanitarian work. On a recent occasion, she was publicly selling flags at the Gibson House, Cincinnati, accompanied by several other ladies who were similarly engaged. She carried a good-sized assortment of little flags, and a banner with the words: "I am helping to stamp out consumption." In the photograph, her husband, Congressman Nicholas Longworth, is standing by her side encouraging her in her benevolent work.

The Vision that Pok Saw

AWAY out in a mountain village in Korea a blind man named Pok heard the story of Jesus, and into his empty life was born the passionate longing to read the words of the loving Saviour day by day. He got hold of an old tin, made up an alphabet for himself, which he cut out, letting each queer little piece represent a letter of the Korean alphabet. Then he taught his alphabet to some friends, and they would string a verse of Scripture and he would memorize it! So he learned six chapters of John's Gospel! Then one day the moksa (missionary) reached that far-away village for the first time, and that particular moksa happened to be Mr. Bruen. After the Sunday morning sermon he noticed a man busy over a string of queer little tin pieces, and asked him what he had. The man looked up with his sweet smile and his blind eyes, and read off that morning's text with the deft, eager fingers.

Then he learned for the first time of that wonderful school in Pyeng Yang, where blind people learn to read the Bible for themselves. He only had a scrap of a farm, and there was the wife and two children to take care of, so the next years were hard grind and bitter saving; but they ended in light, for Pok had seen a vision, and a vision to him meant that realization had to come. In one short month he learned to read, a feat never before accomplished in less than three months by any man, and started home. With his vision satisfied? Oh, no! He has a bigger one now.

You see there are other blind men down in southern Korea. Had you thought of that? Well, Pok had! He came to tell Mr. Bruen about it. He said we must have a blind school in the south, too, where our blind men and girls could come. "Of course," he said, "I may not be wise or clever enough to teach it (they had told him he was just the man to do it in Pyeng Yang), but I want to help, and I can make books. I can't afford a blind Bible, they are so expensive; so I am going right home to make one. I'll write out the first six chapters of John; and while I do that I'll teach my wife to read. Then, meanwhile, I wonder if something couldn't be done to see if the churches would not like to try to get together money enough to start a school."

A little group of Koreans pledged 25 yen to start the school. Friends in America are helping, and soon Pok's vision will be realized.

AMONG THE VILLAGES OF THE ANDES

ON one of my recent trips to a city in the Andes (a few hours' ride from where my family was temporarily staying for a needed change of climate) there was no railroad, so I had hired a mule. When I came to get the mule, I was informed that it was a "kicker," which would throw any one who tried to ride it. As there was no other animal to be had just then, I took my chances, and we reached the city without accident.

On a previous visit to the same city, I had sold all my stock of Testaments, Gospels and booklets in less than two days, so this time I took a still larger supply, and hired a "burro" to carry the books. To my joy, I found the people even more ready to receive the Gospel now than on my previous visit. In a few days, my stock was again exhausted, and I had to send a boy off to get more.

Of course, there were plenty of fanatics who tried to attack me and our work, but their attacks gave us an opportunity to put their superstitions and the Gospel side by side, which often brought conviction to the surrounding crowds. One evening, when I was just returning from a hard but blessed day's work, I met the Roman Catholic priest. As I knew him from my former visit, I greeted him and began a conversation with him, but he was very angry at the work I was doing in the city. After trying to attack my work in different ways, he finally said: "You had better pack up and go to California, or some other place in the North. Here, in South America, there is no place for your religion. You are only wasting your time and energy to no effect, as I have gathered up all the books you sold last year, and the people will have nothing to do with you. Furthermore, I am now going to the church to tell the people to burn all the books that they may have bought from you now."

Continuing his angry tone, he further asked me to note how science and art had flourished in Catholic South America, while in Protestant North America they had only "machinery." I could hardly help laughing at such ignorance; and still, this was one of the most respectable priests in Venezuela.

Before I left the city I went to visit this priest, to find out how many he had of the books, and to my surprise I found that he had only two small pamphlets. When I took leave, the priest warned me strongly not to make my appearance in that town again, as in such case it would "go badly with me." I found, later, that he thought by writing a fierce article against me to stir up the sentiment of the ignorant people, so that I should not dare to appear among them. He wrote a note against me, and it was as sarcastic and bigoted as could be; but, instead of turning the people against me, it turned them against himself, so that he lost the respect of the better class in the town. He was not aware of the true situation. He did not know that one of the prominent teachers in his own private school was my friend, and a constant student of the Bible and evangelical books. He did not know that the director of the highest public school in the city was interested in the Gospel, and had offered us a lecture hall belonging to a literary society to hold meetings. He did not know that scores of men and women all over the city had bought Testaments and Christian books from us, and were hiding them away in their stores and homes, so that he should not find out about them. Light and darkness were brought face to face, and the light proved the stronger.

We have found this kind of work to be very effective in Venezuela, especially since we started to publish a regular mission paper, which keeps up the interest in the places we have visited. It is the best means for preparing the way for permanent work in such cities. We have already had the privilege of sending the paper regularly to about fifty towns and villages in the republic of Venezuela. It is the only evangelical paper published in the republic. Our mission has its own printing establishment, where we not only publish the paper, but also evangelical books and tracts.

We are in great need of help for our publication work, and I hope it will be possible to interest your readers in it. There is no better way than this of spreading the Gospel in Venezuela. We would also welcome any offers of support from friends for a native evangelist to assist in the work here.

One day, we received a letter with money enclosed for two subscriptions for our Spanish paper. The letter was from a man living in a city in the Andes. He had seen a copy of our paper, and had become interested in it. Shortly afterward, when I was visiting the same city, I went to call on this man, and to my surprise I found him in his home reading the Bible. In conversation with him, I found he had already quite a knowledge of the Gospel from reading God's Word, and was anxious to learn more. He bought several evangelical books from us, and continued his study of the truth, and it was not long before he openly stepped out and confessed Christ. He was a well educated man, and was author of several good historical books. Having a talent for writing, he soon sent us a good evangelical article, which we published. His article immediately aroused the fiercest opposition from the priest in the same town. The priest publishes a small monthly paper, and in its next issue a long article appeared in which the priest attacked the other, who did not answer, but instead kept on writing articles, in which he convincingly shows the contents, history, helpfulness, power and blessings of the Bible, and exhorts every family to own one and to use it constantly.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" IN THE BAHAMAS

IN all its marvelously wide circulation I doubt if THE CHRISTIAN HERALD finds anywhere a more cordial welcome than in the reading-room of the Columbus Institute Clubs of Grantstown, a suburb of Nassau, Bahama Islands. For a period of two weeks the two issues of the paper received in the fortnightly mail lie on the counter of this long and narrow room, where for three evenings of every week it is devoured by the members of the C. I. C. No. 1, who are young colored men and boys. On the afternoons of the same dates, C. I. C. No. 2, composed of young women and girls, enjoys the same privilege. At the end of the fortnight, or when the incoming Ward Liner brings a fresh instalment, these magazines are numbered and loaned out, with what other magazines and books the little C. I. C. library contains.

Providentially, as it proves, a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was given to these young people on last Thanksgiving Day by Mrs. T. S. Strong, of Setauket, L. I. And I question whether more ardent thanks for any other gift have, during the last ten months, been offered by any other group of persons than have gone up from the hearts of these young folk on this isolated island of the sea. The history of these clubs is a pathetic and at the same time an encouraging one. Some years ago it was our lot to spend a winter in Nassau, with nothing of special moment on our hands. Conditions among the colored people were such as to attract our notice and to appeal strongly to our sympathies. We were so moved by what we saw and heard that we could not bring ourselves to leave the field until we had induced the people themselves to make a start toward the building of an industrial, or vocational, school. The attempt was so far successful that a society was incorporated and other steps taken, all of which promised success to the enterprise.

Unfortunately, the work, after being well launched, fell under the control of indifferent managers and then came to a standstill. In March, 1908, we started a fresh movement, under the patronage of the Governor, and with a more happily chosen name this time, The Columbus Memorial Institute. The first to support the movement were the prospective beneficiaries—the young men—who promptly formed themselves into the Columbus Institute Club. The formation of the second club followed, a few weeks later. A vacant shop was rented, and the little store of books and magazines belonging to the C. I. C.'s arranged on the shelves and counter. On June 9 the reading-room was opened. The members of C. I. C. Nos. 1 and 2 were present, and two members of a third club, just organized at Cherokee Sound (one hundred miles distant by boat) were also with us. Prayers were offered for a safe journey for us and that we might return invigorated for our work. Short speeches were called for. A sweet-faced, modest girl told what a good thing for herself and her companions the reading privileges had proved, and that she wished every one could know how much THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would do for his or her improvement and happiness. Her little speech brought a shower of cheers.

The earnest faces and bright dark eyes, many of them wistful for educational privileges so long denied them, would, if they could be so presented, make an irresistible appeal. And not only donations of reading matter, but the building and equipping of the Columbus Memorial Institute, would speedily follow.

Among the Busy Religious Workers at Home and Abroad

—PASTOR JOHN BEERS, of Sparks Chapel, Key West., Fla., writes us that his chapel was leveled to the ground by the great hurricane of October 11. A congregation of 400 is now without a church home. Everywhere about the chapel are scenes of desolation and ruin.

—THE NEXT World Missionary Conference will meet in Edinburgh, June 14, 1910. American delegates and their friends will sail on the steamship Kroonland, which arrives in Southampton Thursday, June 9. From Southampton a special train will take them direct to Edinburgh.

—IN FORMER days, D. L. Moody called his fellow-workers together now and again for an inspiring conference. A mid-winter conference at the Chicago Bible Institute this year will be held early, to take advantage of the return from Australia of Messrs. Chapman and Alexander, and their associates, who will reach Chicago December 2.

—MR. R. A. EDWARDS, Holmesburg, Philadelphia, writes to correct the impression that no religious instruction is given in Girard College. He says: "It is constantly given. Bible talks, etc., are given in the chapel every Sunday by leading Christian laymen of Philadelphia. No clergyman, however, is allowed to enter—neither Catholic nor Protestant."

—A GREAT FEATURE of the Gipsy Smith meetings in Chicago last month was the chorus singing in charge of Dr. D. B. Towner. Out of an enrolment of about 2,500 singers there was an average nightly attendance of 1,000 for thirty nights, in addition to those present at the afternoon meetings.

—J. S. HELMER, secretary and treasurer China Inland Mission, writes: "We have had the pleasure of receiving your check for $30, from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for the work in China. The work is most encouraging at the present time. There has been an outpouring of God's spirit in various parts of the great empire. In the Union College of Weihsien, in Shangtung, there are no less than one hundred students offering for the Christian ministry. Never before has China been so open to the Gospel."

—REV. FRANK HIGGINS is known among the lumbermen of Minnesota as their "sky pilot." He carries the Gospel to 30,000 lumbermen in the northern part of that State. He has made successful war on saloons and evil resorts in several frontier towns, and he has frequently been a "storm centre" around which the forces of sin have revolved threateningly, but he has been miraculously preserved, and the men almost worship him. He has no fixed church, but itinerates throughout a large district, principally woodlands.

—THE PROGRAMME of the Convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, which meets in Washington this week, covers a four days' session. Among the speakers announced are President Taft, Robert E. Speer, John R. Mott, Rev. S. M. Zwemer, S. B. Capen, and many prominent clerical and lay workers. The topics will include "Men and Missions," "The Church's Interpretation of the Great Commission," "Systematic Missionary Education," "The Awakening Orient," "The Organization Needed to Enlist the Church," etc.

—AT THE MARBLE COLLEGIATE Church, New York, printed copies of the Rev. Dr. Burrell's sermons are gratuitously distributed at the evening service every Sunday. A mailing list has been established, to which names may be added at any time by the payment of $1 to cover postage and mailing for one year. On this list are the names of persons near and far, many of whom by reason of age and infirmities are unable to attend church. Orders may be sent to Mr. H. P. Wareheim, 1 West Twenty-ninth Street, New York.

NOVEMBER SUNSHINE

By Margaret E. Sangster

A Cold Snap

FAULT-FINDING with the weather is so common a thing that it makes little impression upon ourselves whether we are speakers or listeners. We rise in the morning, glance from the window, see rain that we did not expect, or a frost that we did not want, or a blanket of fog, and we turn away, shrugging our shoulders and exclaiming at the disagreeable day. The leaves go whirling and scurrying before the blast, and we are annoyed because it is not altogether pleasant to walk in the teeth of the wind. We may anticipate all sorts of weather by land and sea in these November days. The incoming steamers will report rough weather outside, and the morning newspaper chronicle tempests and tornadoes in some portions of our vast continent. Yet why should we find fault?

We shall have plenty of sunshine in November. It has never yet failed to bring us the kindly interval that we call Indian Summer, when the ripened leaves float slowly downward to rest upon the ground, when the atmosphere is amber and opal, and when the south wind touches the cheek with a tender caress. Indian Summer is so dreamy, so charming, so blissful that it shines like a pearl on the brow of November.

When a cold snap comes it behooves us not to go shivering around, not to exclaim against a transient discomfort, and not to behave in the temperate zone as if we were explorers faring through Arctic seas. A cold snap invites us to sit, if we can, by an open fire, with the leap and sparkle of flame, with the pleasure of poking the embers and seeing them blaze, and with the chance of roasting apples and telling stories in the evening. A fire that we can see is a real boon in the house. I would not have this fire a simulacrum of gas, let it resemble ever so closely an oak or hickory log. The one thing that can be said in favor of burning gas on the hearth is that it is clean. Beyond this there is not a quality it possesses worth comparison with anthracite coal deeply glowing in a grate, with the hiss and splendor of cannel coal, or with the freakish beauty of pine knots blazing merrily in the wintry dusk.

Is it not surprising how much better we all feel in a cold snap than we do in a season of tropical heat? There is tonic and cordial in frosty air, and we ought to make the best of the days that come before the snow. There is nothing to hinder us from outdoor enjoyment just now, if we are sensible, if we wear short skirts that clear the ground well, and if our shoes have low heels and comfortable soles. These remarks about dress are, of course, only applicable to women. Men, at least in Western lands, have known from time immemorial how to dress for business and for pleasure, and their clothing is no bar, as that of women often is, to healthful exercise.

Bryant wrote:

> The melancholy days have come,
> The saddest of the year,
> Of wailing winds and naked woods
> And meadows brown and sear.

But we who love autumnal tints and autumnal sunshine, and who find in all the year no sunshine more perfect at morning or evening than that which comes to us from November skies, cannot call the days melancholy. They are good days, when we are glad to be alive. The lads are playing football, the housewives have finished their autumn cleaning, the schools are crowded with children, the churches are beginning in earnest their winter campaign, Thanksgiving is approaching, and after Thanksgiving we shall all be ready for Merry Christmas, and so the happy time goes by. Blessings on the cold snap, that draws the home dear ones closer together!

A TYPICAL HIGH-CLASS CHINESE LADY AND FAMILY

NO feature of modern life is more remarkable than the progress of new ideas in China. High-class girls in China are being thoroughly educated according to our methods in schools that have the approval of Chinese statesmen. In many of our American colleges for women, there are to be found students from China, not as yet in large numbers. Where these girls are found their docility, intelligence, grace and adaptability make them great favorites. The picture shows a typical high-class Chinese lady, one fitted by birth and training to be a social leader. She is Lady Yu, the daughter-in-law of Prince Ting. Lady Yu, in dress and demeanor, is an agreeable type of the best women in the empire. Such women owe very much to the European and American gentlewomen who are their teachers and friends. The lady seated on her left is Mrs. Headland, an American missionary.

Consult the Dictionary

When in doubt as to the proper way of spelling a word, as to its precise definition, pronunciation or derivation, do not leave the matter undecided, but consult the dictionary. If you find that you are a little weak in spelling, the best way to strengthen yourself in this particular direction is to go at once to the fountain head of knowledge. Asking friends or people in the room with you how to spell a word is an easy way out of the difficulty, but there are two reasons against its adoption. One is that the friends may be no better informed than you are, and that in following their advice you may make a mistake. The other is that the sight of the eyes fixes correct knowledge much more firmly in the brain than the hearing of the ears. What you hear makes a less vivid impression and is more readily forgotten than what you see. Your duty to your mother tongue should lead you to be very careful about the speech you use in conversation and the style you gain in writing. Correct speaking and writing is within the reach of every one who thinks it worth while to take pains.

If you fancy that the dictionary does not furnish authoritative decisions or interesting reading, you will be disabused of your error by studying its pages. Every standard lexicon tells you whence the words in common use are derived, and gives examples of the way in which they have served other generations than ours. To add to an imperfect vocabulary and increase a working stock of English words you must acquire the habit of turning often to the best attainable dictionary. No house is well furnished that lacks this valuable possession.

Holiday Planning

IT is not a bit too soon to begin planning for the holidays, although they are still some weeks in the distance. Those of us who like to extend our Christmas giving beyond the circle of our home dear ones and our intimate friends should remember that a box or barrel that is to be sent, for instance, to gladden the heart of a missionary on the frontier, or a welfare worker in any department, must be filled and, if sent by freight, dispatched some weeks in advance of Christmas. All such gifts of love should be prepared with the greatest care, and when intended for a family should have a special fitness for each individual. In order to send an acceptable box from a church, a home or a friend, there must be previous knowledge of those to whom the surprise shall convey pleasure.

In thinking of making gifts, let them be ever so trivial, there should be a thought of the person for whom they are meant. That which would charm a child may not gratify an old lady or gentleman. Usually, if presents are made to boys who are beyond the nursery, it is wiser to select tools, with which they can work, or articles useful in their games, than toys or articles of dress. If a boy is in need of an overcoat or a pair of shoes, and his father can afford to clothe him comfortably, he will not greatly appreciate shoes or coat as a holiday gift. If, on the other hand, he is in need of warm garments and understands that the home people cannot supply them, his holiday will be the sweeter if they reach him from a friendly hand. It is not too soon, if the holidays are to yield their full measure of joy, to begin our planning now.

The Young Girl's Reading

The young girl who loves to read and her neighbor who cares little for reading require different treatment, the one being held back and the other urged forward by teachers and parents. The first girl can resist nothing that she sees in print; the second prefers games and puzzles, music and sewing, gardening and housekeeping to a quiet hour over a book. There is little danger that she will be injured by anything that she reads. It is a lamentable fact that much of the fiction published to-day is unfit for the reading of young people of either sex. We can only hope that the pendulum may swing back to the delicacy and refinement of a former generation. Books issued from reputable presses to-day throw Fielding and Smollet into the shade by their indelicacy and needless realism.

The girl who loves to read should be provided with books written by the older authors in preference to those now challenging popular favor. Mrs. Oliphant and Charles Dickens may be read by all girls with profit and pleasure. The novels of Winston Churchill and Mary Johnston are charming in the glimpses they give of American life. Do not try to prevent young girls from reading stories, but, so far as you may, guide them in their choice of attractive and stirring fiction.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—EATING BETWEEN MEALS. "I have heard of a school where a lunch is provided for the children at the eleven o'clock recess. Do you think it a good plan for children to eat between meals?" As many children have very little appetite for breakfast, and as there is a long space of time between the morning and the noon-day meal, a little bread and butter at eleven o'clock will do them no harm. On the contrary, a slight repast at that hour is wholesome for most children.

A USEFUL LIFE ENDED

IT is often said that the world is so big, so busy, so taken up with its own affairs, that no man is really missed when he lays down his work in this world. There are, however, many examples which show that this, like all generalizations, has but a small kernel of truth, and that there are men in our business, religious and social life who have made such a place for themselves that their place cannot at once be filled, if it is ever. A readjustment takes place, but the great mind and heart are missed. John S. Kennedy, banker, builder of railways and philanthropist, was one of these. He passed away recently at his home in New York, at the age of seventy-nine. Mr. Kennedy's career is one of the most interesting in American finance. He was born in a small town not far from Glasgow, Scotland. The family were not richly blessed with the goods of this world, so at the age of thirteen he went to Glasgow, where he became a shipping clerk. He not only supported himself, but did what he could to help his brothers and sisters at home.

In 1850 a coal and iron firm, wishing to expand its business, sent him to America. Two years later, he was back in Glasgow as manager of the office. At this time he was scarcely twenty. The call of the New World, however, was insistent, and he came back and entered the banking business, with which he was so prominently identified until his death. From banking his interests spread to railroads, and he was the financial backer of several lines which are among the most important in the country.

The Late John S. Kennedy

Mr. Kennedy did not let his interest in the great game of business dwarf his interest in charity, his church, art and literature. His later years were devoted for the most part to his charitable enterprises, which made a long list. He was president of the Presbyterian Hospital, and acted as its manager. He gave $400,000 to build a home for the nurses. In 1891 he erected the United Charities Building in New York, and presented it to four leading charity organizations. He gave generously to home and foreign missions, to homes for the crippled and to colleges. To Columbia University he gave half a million dollars, but only on condition that the name of the donor should not be disclosed as long as he lived. Thousands went to art museums and libraries. If great wealth is a trust for the benefit of humanity Mr. Kennedy was certainly one of the most open-hearted and worthy of trustees. He derived pleasure from his various charities, and placed a number of them beyond the need of outside aid in the days to come. By his will he left $30,000,000 to various charitable and benevolent institutions, to the church and to missionary and educational work. He also left a large number of legacies and provided annuities for a number of friends of limited means. His entire estate is estimated at $60,000,000, of which one-half goes to charity and philanthropy, in addition to $10,000,000 which he gave personally in aid of similar causes during his lifetime.

Two Views On Woman Suffrage

TO THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

If any one imagines that the enfranchisement of women will prove a panacea for all our political, moral and social ills, he or she has only to study the polluting conditions in the States which have already given the ballot to woman to see how fallacious are all such claims. Women are not the only citizens of our republic who are taxed without representation. The makers of our Constitution could not have wrestled with this question or else they would have written it in the Constitution. They seem to have assumed that, with the fathers, brothers, husbands and lovers at the ballot-box and in the legislative bodies, the interests of mothers, sisters, daughters, wives and sweethearts would be safeguarded. Such has been the case in the past, and such it will continue to be, unless the presiding geniuses of our homes transform themselves into Amazons and Delilahs.

W. H. WEST.

Hermansville, Md.

Our correspondent does not seem to realize that the whole spirit of our Constitution breathes that taxation without representation is tyranny. When, in response to the protest of the Colonies, measures were forming in Parliament for the repeal of the Stamp Act in 1766, Lord Camden said in the House of Lords: "Taxation and representation are inseparably united. God has joined them. No British Parliament can separate them. This position I will maintain to my last hour. It is founded on the law of nature. It is itself an eternal law of nature."

So fully was this fact recognized by the fathers of our republic that they embraced in their provisions for freedom all citizens, excepting "criminals, idiots, Indians and women." One hundred and fifty years ago women were not so highly regarded as now, when education has shown them to be of great value as advisers and counselors. Words which then sounded reasonable now shock us.

Mr. West thinks that the condition of affairs in the equal suffrage States does not support the claims that women's votes do good.

A State Industrial School for Girls is needed in every State, and would probably do more to promote virtuous womanhood than any other one institution. Colorado women worked long for one, but it did not come until they got the ballot. In Massachusetts, women worked for fifty-five years to secure the law making mothers equal guardians of their children with the fathers. In Colorado, after women were enfranchised, the very next Legislature granted such a law.

The Attorney-General of Wyoming wrote to A. C. Thomas, of Jefferson, Ore. (we give his letter in condensed form): "I was greatly prejudiced against woman suffrage before I came to Wyoming, but I have observed the practical results of the system here, and have changed my mind. I am now convinced that woman suffrage is a rational principle and a benefit to the State. It stimulates study and interest in public affairs among women. Mothers learn ideals of citizenship, which they impress on the minds of their children. Better men are nominated for office, since women will not tolerate immoral men in high positions; and better order is preserved at polling-places during elections."

To-day, and largely owing to the efforts of suffragists, all of these conditions have changed, though still in several States women are at a disadvantage in many ways before the law.

Women will, as a class, be no less religious, gentle, beautiful and affectionate than now when they vote; while they will be rendered more thoughtful, more noble and more helpful by the high responsibility which the suffrage imposes.

BEFORE THE DOCTOR COMES

THIS is one of the best and most serviceable Premium Books offered by us within the past ten years, and will unquestionably be the means of saving much needless suffering and, perhaps, many a life.

Emergencies will arise, and, when they do come, we need such a wise, practical counselor as Before the Doctor Comes.

To more forcibly illustrate the importance of this work to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we take the liberty of propounding a few questions that may suggest in a practical way the real value of this up-to-date work.

What Would You Do While Waiting for the Physician:—

Were your child bitten by a mad dog?

Were baby to develop diphtheria in the night?

Were some one in the family to take poison by mistake?

Were you to get a cinder imbedded in the eye?

Were baby to develop croup and have bad choking spells?

Were an artery cut, with danger of bleeding to death?

Were you called upon to revive some one nearly drowned?

Were your child to sprain an ankle while walking with you?

Were a visitor at your home to suddenly faint?

Were your child to swallow a coin?

Were a fishbone to get caught in your throat?

Were your child to fall and be rendered unconscious?

Were a spider to poison one of your family?

Were you seized with a fit of sneezing or hiccoughs?

Were one of your family to be badly burned or scalded with boiling water?

Were a member of your family to fall and fracture a limb or dislocate an elbow or a shoulder?

Were you to detect symptoms of either scarlet fever or the measles in your child while traveling?

Without "Before The Doctor Comes" you may do the proper thing; but with this splendid work to guide you, you KNOW that you are doing the best that can be done.

THE PARTNER OF THE RANCH

By M. P. LINDSLEY

"HYAH, Graves," drawled the real estate agent, turning to a tall, gaunt ex-Vermonter, with a straggling beard, "you're jes' hittin' the trail for home. Cain't you drive Dr. Walton out to Clumpp's place? He wants to buy a ranch. I was talkin' to you-all about him yes'day."

Dick Walton climbed into the buckboard. Graves got in beside him, and started the two mules. The buckboard jolted over sagebrush, occasionally scaring a rabbit or disturbing a lark from her nest. The air seemed to possess some subtle electrical quality which made it intoxicating.

Walton's glance swept the wide, open, free spaces, and rested on the soft, rich tints of the mountains in the distance. There rose like a mirage in the desert the vision of a home with Alice Wyeth. She had had pride and fire, and a charming variety of thought and feeling. What had the last four years made of her? The old pain of yearning he had hoped to forget in new scenes tugged at his heart.

"This is a fine arrowgation country, Doc. Burnett and Company's place is nine miles southwest. I'm takin' you there. It's fer sale."

"But I wished to see Clumpp's farm. I don't care to see Burnett's, for from what I've heard it is almost certain I will buy Clumpp's."

"Jes' the same, it's best fer yer to see Burnett and Company's. It's the A-one place of these parts. We'll go there first."

Dr. Walton looked at his companion with interest. It occurred to him, as he noticed the set expression of countenance, that there must be a deep and abiding sympathy between Bill Graves and his mules. And there was. At the sound of his owner's voice raised in argument, one of the mules lay down in the sand, and when prodded merely gazed around at the landscape with a benign expression. When Graves abused him with an astonishing assortment of names, he looked reproachfully at his master and flipped one ear with an air of rakish abandon.

"No use hurryin' Dutch," the ex-Vermonter chuckled. "I named him after them Dutch. He jes' lays down when he feels to admire a rest, an' gets up again when he's a mind to. Dixie looks coy an' timid, and has a shrinking way with her. If anybody goes to pat her she'll r'ar up on her hind legs an' put her forefeet all over you at once, or else turn like lightnin' an' kick you into the next township. There now, I believe Dutch is risin'."

But Dutch didn't deign to arise for some ten minutes, during which time Walton lived through, in imagination, his last quarrel with Alice. His mother had suggested that she preferred a daughter-in-law who did something besides lounge around the house all day, reading novels and eating chocolates; and when he had reached Alice's home, and his first flash of indignation at his mother's criticism had died down, he had realized the truth of her comment.

"I was sorry not to go skating yesterday, Dick," Alice had said, "but I haven't felt well for weeks; don't seem to have a bit of strength or energy."

"It's your own fault. You eat candy and read novels all day, and what can you expect but to feel loppy and miserable?"

"At any rate, I don't have to burden you with my invalidism." Alice's maternal grandmother had come from Tipperary, and Alice had inherited her quickness of temper, her pioneer spirit and her warmth of heart.

"Now, Alice, that isn't fair. You know as well as I do that a girl can't lop around the house all day, like a sick giraffe, and have any vim. You ought to take outdoor exercise, and eat plain, wholesome food. You'd lose that angularity," he blundered on, "and your complexion would clear and get as pretty as that girl's who visited mother last fall."

"Neither my health nor complexion need concern you any further. You realize you've made a mistake, and I will free you from the consequences of it."

"Perhaps I have!"

Her eyes had flashed and her dimpled chin had quivered. She had dropped his diamond ring on the table near him, and gone out of the room and out of his life.

He was jerked suddenly out of the past into the present by Dutch, who rose hastily, and, with an apologetic glance at Dixie, started on the way as if to make up for the delay by speed.

"Dutch never rests more'n fifteen minutes at a time." Graves's tones were apologetic. "You'll get there soon now, I guess. I'd be proper pleased to see you buy Burnett and Company's ranch. You can't find a better one. The company of that firm's a rustler, I tell you. Yes, sir, a rustler an' a student, too, always reading an' studying on arrowgation, which same is a science by itself, it is. Gitap, you wurrabagoes!"

"Why not go to Clumpp's first? I have really decided on Clumpp's."

"Well, I want you should see the best an' git the best fer your money. When a man spends a bunch o' money, he wants somethin' fer it. We'll go to Burnett and Company's first. It costs some more'n Clumpp's, but it's worth double. We'll go there first."

His jaw set doggedly, and Dick yielded the point with inward amusement. Doubtless the ex-Vermonter's hope of a big commission lay Burnettwards.

When they reached Graves's ranch he invited Walton to stop for dinner. The interior of the one-room shack showed the absence of a woman's touch. A pile of old boots adorned the only table, the bunk was unmade, some unwashed cooking utensils were heaped on the stove and a big sack of potatoes braced up a smaller one of onions on one side and a pile of tin cans on the other.

"I keep bach here," said Graves, with childlike pride in his possessions. "You look over the place while I cook some spuds an' coffee an' flip a few flapjacks. This is a good place, but it's not run so scientific as Burnett's."

After the meal, as Graves had some work which would delay his start for two hours, Walton decided to drive on alone, coming back with the mules that evening, spending the night, and returning again the following day to look the place over in company with Graves before deciding against it.

When Dick reached the ranch-house of Burnett and Company a woman was in the front yard turning the water into the ditches. She came toward him as he dismounted.

"I'd like to see Mr. Burnett, please." His voice was politely inquiring.

"Well, stranger, you'd have a long road to travel," she answered grimly, "and I really can't tell you which way to go. Mr. Burnett was killed in the Dewdrop Inn, at Butte, four years ago. I'm his widow. This ranch is mine, or mostly mine."

He studied her a moment with interest as a new specimen, a successful woman rancher of the Northwest. She was tall, strongly built, had gray hair, and a shrewd, kindly, determined face. Strange he had not heard the ranch was owned by a woman. But of course her partner managed it and did the work. She in turn was looking him over, and deciding that she liked the tall young fellow with the square chin and the merry light in his brown eyes.

"Oh, yes, I remember there is a company. Where is your partner, Mrs. Burnett? I'd like to have a talk, with a view to buying this farm."

Her eyes twinkled. "Well, if you don't want to talk ranch with me, you'll find my partner out feeding the chickens. Hit that trail at the side of the house, and you'll find the chicken corral at the end of it."

He followed her directions, but in the chicken-yard saw only an auburn-haired girl, in a short dress of light blue denim. In one hand she held a shallow tin pan, from which she was throwing spoonfuls of food to some little chickens running excitedly to get it. Her whole poise against the background of blue skies and blossom-laden peach trees in the distance was of such grace, beauty and vigor that he paused a moment to admire it.

"Beg pardon, but Mrs. Burnett said I would find——"

She turned, startled, and stood looking at him with dilated eyes and crimson cheeks. Her face was very lovely, with its fresh, healthful curves, and her eyes and dimpled chin he would have known among a thousand.

"Alice!" All the repressed desire of four years was in his voice.

The next instant the pan and spoon fell clattering to the ground, and her arms were flung around his neck and tightly clasped there.

"Well," remarked Mrs. Burnett, drily, as he returned some moments later to the front yard, his arm around Alice's waist, "I see you found my partner."

"I didn't find your partner at all," he laughed; "I found my own. Miss Wyeth and I have been engaged for five years—that is, intermittently. What are you doing in this out-of-the-way spot, anyhow, Alice?"

"Alice is my niece, and my partner in this ranch."

Walton's astonished gaze went from one to the other. "You don't mean——"

"Yes, she does, and I am. You remember the advice you gave me? It made me furious, because I never could endure that girl you wanted me to have a complexion like. I thought you were in love with her, and just trying to find an excuse to break our engagement. Afterward, I was more angry with myself than with you, for I knew you told me the truth. I decided to come West, and fight it out alone. Uncle James had started this place, and after he died Aunt Mildred and I worked it together. You've no idea how we've worked, and we've made a big success of it, too. I'm almost glad we quarreled, Dick, or rather that I did, for it has been the making of me."

"Well," bemoaned Bill Graves that evening, as he unhitched Dutch and Dixie after receiving Dick's confidence about his approaching wedding, "I ain't congratulatin' you none, for I don't think you'll find trottin' double pays, though she's a rustler. I'm about the only single man about here that ain't popped the question to her once or twice. I would have, too, but fer an onhappy past. You see, I got a hunch onct that it was time fer me to hitch up. There was a grass widder over to Clarkston that took a great fancy to me. Seemed like she couldn't bear me out of her sight, an' she was always laughin' an' happy when I was near. Well, I says to myself, I says, 'Bill, you consarned fool,' I says, 'don't do nothing rash,' I says. 'Remember,' I says, 'that it costs a bunch o' money,' I says, 'to run a gold-haired grass widder,' I says. So I kept house for two jes' for a while to see. I found it cost too much.

"That widder sure cared a heap fer me," he went on, with a reminiscent sigh, "an' when I told her it was all off an' why, you should have saw the look she give me. She was plumb broken-hearted, and jes' went and throwed herself away on a man from Butte. Now do you wonder I can't seem to congratulate you none?"

Though the sentiments of the man from Vermont had moulded Dr. Walton's immediate past and present, they were not likely to change his future, for he stood gazing off toward Burnett and Company's ranch with a rapt expression, not taking in the meaning of Graves's words. His heart was singing a sweeter song than the lark that rose from a nest in the sagebrush near and soared straight up toward heaven.

IN NEXT WEEK'S ISSUE

THE "STRAWBERRY HANDKERCHIEF"

A DELIGHTFUL love story of old Colonial Days in New York. The opening chapter of this New and Fascinating Serial, by Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, author of Jan Vedder's Wife, The Bow of Orange Ribbon, etc., will appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD next week. It is a charming romance of that most picturesque period of early American history. Jansen Van Vroom and his wife Katrina, with their sailor son and their pretty daughter, Virginia, and her rival suitors, Joris Artaveldt and Batavius De Vries, make a characteristic group, around which the main action of the story revolves.

Begins in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, next week.

try. His own hopes, rather than the fears of others, were realized. With two interpreters—a converted Turkish mollah and an Armenian—he safely reached Kashgar, which is part of the Chinese dominions. When he left, the former mollah remained as an evangelist; other Christians have gone there, and a little congregation has been formed of converted Chinese, with representatives also of several other races.

Mr. Hoijer's visit to the United States is for the purpose of interesting the friends of missions in his evangelical work in Russia and the East. He is fully accredited by the officials of the Russian Evangelical Alliance, and the president of the Alliance, Zinovii Zakharov, has written strongly commending him and his work to the favorable consideration of the Christians of America. A great opportunity has opened in Russia since the granting of "freedom of belief" by the imperial ukase of 1905. More workers are needed, and the field is ripe for earnest evangelical pastors and missionaries.

Mr. Hoijer, while in this country, will speak in churches and elsewhere on the religious situation in Russia and the East. His wonderful experience and his facility in speaking English make him a most interesting and instructive narrator. Any reader desiring to aid in this specially meritorious work, or church officials and others who wish to hear Pastor Hoijer's story from his own lips, may address him to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

This is for Mothers to read

There used to be an idea that a mother should nurse her baby in spite of every obstacle.

Mother should nurse her baby, if she can, but if it is apparent that the nursing does not agree in simple fairness to baby Mellin's Food, prepared with fresh milk, should be used.

Look at the picture of this rugged, rosy-cheeked boy. He was raised on

WELCH HUDSON HENRITZE, JR

Mellin's Food

He is only one of thousands of babies, whose pictures we have received and can show you.

Mellin's Food is not only a scientifically correct food, but it is one of the simplest and most practical foods to use.

Mellin's Food is added to fresh milk to make the milk like mother's milk, and it does this so well, and makes the milk so digestible, that on it babies thrive steadily and happily.

No colic; no other digestion troubles, if Mellin's Food, properly prepared, is used.

If you have a baby in your home to love and care for, and cannot nurse him, do not wait, buy a bottle of Mellin's Food to-day. You can get it at any druggist's.

If you would like a copy of our helpful book, "The Care and Feeding of Infants", we shall be very glad to send it to you, prepaid, if you will send us the coupon.

A FOOD DRINK

Which Brings Daily Enjoyment.

A lady doctor writes:

"Though busy hourly with my own affairs. I will not deny myself the pleasure of taking a few minutes to tell of my enjoyment daily obtained from my morning cup of Postum. It is a food beverage, not a stimulant like coffee.

"I began to use Postum 8 years ago, not because I wanted to, but because coffee which I dearly loved, made my nights long weary periods to be dreaded and unfitting me for business during the day.

"On advice of a friend, I first tried Postum, making it carefully as suggested on the package. As I had always used "cream and no sugar," I mixed my Postum so. It looked good, was clear and fragrant, and it was a pleasure to see the cream color it as my Kentucky friend always wanted her coffee to look, like a new saddle.

"Then I tasted it critically, for I had tried many 'substitutes' for coffee. I was pleased, yes, satisfied with my Postum in taste and effect, and am yet, being a constant user of it all these years.

I continually assure my friends and acquaintances that they will like Postum in place of coffee, and receive benefit from its use. I have gained weight, can sleep and am not nervous."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Are You Well?

Have You a Good Figure?

You can surprise your husband and friends by giving 15 minutes a day, in your room, to special directions which I give you to strengthen vital organs and nerves, so you are relieved of chronic ailments. Your body can be rounded and you can have as good a figure, as gracefully carried, as any woman of your acquaintance.

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am! I wore low neck and short sleeves the other night and I was so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. You remember I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. I guess my stomach must be stronger too, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel as if I had missed so much enjoyment in life, for I never did have such good times before. I feel so well all the time."

I have built up thousands of women why not you? Write me, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so.

I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands.

The Duty of Abstinence*

Sunday School Lesson for "World's Temperance Sunday"
by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE attention of every one who aims to keep step with progress is challenged by the call to celebrate in every land "World's Temperance Sunday," on November 28. This celebration comes between a world parliament on alcohol, recently held in London, with twenty-five governments participating officially, and another world parliament on opium, soon to meet at The Hague, to which the same white nations, and others of Asia, are invited by President Taft. Surely the men's Bible classes and leagues which are studying not only the Bible, but also home and foreign missions, cannot fail to see that the three events have a heroic and practical relation to their three great studies. The new theme, "Men and Missions," should mean that something manly is to be done besides praying and giving—and where can a more manly task be found than in fighting opium and liquors in foreign mission fields? Let not the governments outrun the churches in this missionary crusade. There is but one manlier crusade for the men's organizations of the churches, and that is the fight against alcohol at their own doors.

Paul's chief argument, that we should abstain for the sake of others, even from meat that had been laid on the altar of an idol, if by eating in such a case we should cause some "weaker brother" to suffer spiritual harm, should be supplemented by the added light God has given us through history and experience, and especially through the new translations that scientists are making of God's oldest testament of nature, which show us we should also abstain for our own sakes, for our own highest efficiency, which, to every noble soul who conserves his powers in order to do good, is really but another way of abstaining for the sake of others.

Recent experimentation on the effects of alcohol by doctors and physiologists, especially in Germany, show that the most moderate use of beer and wine injures individual health and lessens physical and mental efficiency, and by heredity and otherwise m aces social welfare. These disc eries ought to be as well known, a create at least as great interest as t discovery of the North Pole, to wh so much more of money and coura have been devoted with less of use result. The story of these expe ments on alcohol, as told by Sir Vic Horsley and Dr. Mary Sturge in th illustrated book, Alcohol and the H man Body, is as fascinating as the s ries of sixteenth century explore discovering new lands. The ma points may be brought out in a fai story that is at once wonderful a true, and of interest alike to the chi the boy and the college professor.

Drugging the White Body-guard

The greatest of recent medical d coveries is that most of our diseases tuberculosis, typhoid, influenza, a many more—are caused by little m crobes that beset us all the wh in countless armies of invisible flyi serpents. The cholera microbe named for the comma (,) which it r sembles, as it also resembles a serpe We are like the Israelites, who we attacked by thousands of very sm "fiery serpents," fiery in their bron color and in the poison which the deadly bite sent swiftly through th red rivers of the body, making the like the poisoned rivers of plagu stricken Egypt—only our microbe en mies are so small they can be seen onl by aid of a microscope. They are many shapes, and each kind has a di ferent poison and causes a differer disease. These, and all poisons, the do tors call "toxins"—the same word tha makes a part of the word "intoxica ing," to remind us that alcohol is als a toxin—not a microbe, but the wast product of microbes. The ferment look like velvet as they wait in thou sands on a grape, until the skin i broken by the wine press or otherwise when they rush in and gorge them selves and excrete the deadly alcohol The tiny yeast cells do the sam when barley or other grain is broken

And it is only when we are som way "broken," that is, wounded, o cold, or weary, or poisoned with re tained waste products, or drugge with alcohol or some other narcotic that the microbes, which are all abou us, are likely to do us any harm, fo God has placed in the red rivers of ou bodies "little white soldiers," ou white body-guard, which the doctor call "leucocytes." These have been de fending us against microbes ever sinc man was created, though men neve knew until lately there were such littl friends within or such little foes with out.

Men have invented microscopes by

*The International Sunday School Lesson for November 28, 1909. Rom. 14: 10-21. GOLDEN TEXT: "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth." Rom. 14: 21. Teachers will wish to read as side lights to the Golden Text, other passages in which Paul discusses this same subject: Rom. 13: 8-14; I. Cor. 10: 23-33; Gal. 5: 15-26; 6: 7, 8; Eph. 5: 11-18; I. Thess. 5: 14-25. The Quarterly Temperance Lesson should usually be taught to the main school by the pastor, or some selected expert who has carefully prepared himself on the latest discoveries in the progressing study of alcohol. "The World Book of Temperance," prepared by the teachers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Million Bible Class, contains the quarterly temperance lessons for the whole six years' course, with Bible commentary, temperance history, statistics, and many pictures, charts and anecdotes. SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON which they can see their microbe foes, and at the same time they have discovered the white body-guard, the little white corpuscles in the blood, whose mission is to swim swiftly wherever microbes attack us, whether on a sore outside or somewhere inside of us, and attack and devour them. When a boy gets a scratch on his hand, these white soldiers swim there swiftly and surround the spot to keep the poison from spreading, if possible, and to devour the microbes that the wound may heal. White "pus" is made up of the dead bodies of little white soldiers that died fighting for us.

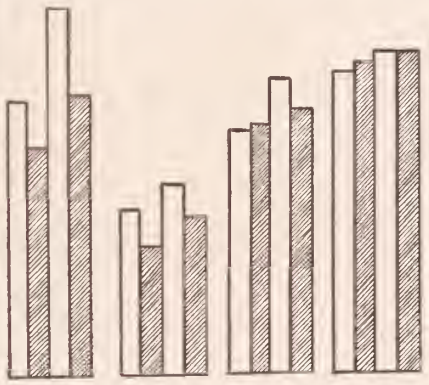
Our bodies would manifestly be like a fort whose soldiers were dead or drugged, if our body-guard should be put "out of combat." Now there are four ways in which the little white soldiers are spoiled for fighting. If our bodies are chilled, the little soldiers are too numb to swim through blood as thick as half-frozen molasses to get at the "septus microbe" that in such case gives us the influenza. If we are overworked, the little white soldiers are too tired to fight, and the carbuncle microbe, or some other, has his own way. If our livers or kidneys are not doing their daily work, then uric acid poisons the white soldiers, and the microbes do their deadly work unhindered. But worst of all is alcohol, which does the work of cold and fatigue and uric acid, and chloroforms our body-guard besides. Alcohol chills us by driving the blood to the surface, which is like pouring tea in a saucer to cool. That is why all successful Arctic explorers avoid alcohol. After a few moments of warmth, the bodily temperature falls. Alcohol wearies, for during the first effect of temporary stimulation it drives the heart machine at double-quick, and then comes another wearying effect of reaction.

Effect of Alcohol on Cells, Plants and Animals

Since plants and animals and men are all made up, like a honey-comb, of tiny microscopic cells, "exact laboratory, clinical and pathological research have demonstrated that alcohol is a dehydrating protoplasmic poison, and hence its use as a beverage is destructive and degenerating to the human organism. Its effects on the cells and tissues of the body are depressive, narcotic and anæsthetic. Hence, therapeutically, it should be used with the same care and restrictions as other poisonous drugs."



Dr. Aschaffenberg's Eight Tests of Four Typesetters

Black signifies alcoholic days, White, abstinent days. As effects of a bottle of wine in some cases can be detected three days after, a comparison of habitual abstainers with moderate drinkers would probably show a still greater contrast.

Alcohol stimulates the tongue and the passions to foolish words and beastly acts, but it dulls the judgment and the conscience, and, after a brief quickening of physical effort, slows up even hand and foot. Strange that any one should suppose that what he takes for a "night-cap" to put him to sleep may serve as an "eye-opener" in the morning to stimulate either body or mind. "Wine is a mocker."

Strength and Industrial Efficiency Both Marred by Alcohol

Thus far we have clearly proved—have we not?—that very "moderate drinking" of beer and wine injures health by drugging our body-guard and poisoning the whole cellular system. We need not pause to remind boys and young men that the diet of the athlete shows that all intoxicating drinks are a foe of strength.

Why Irrigation Bonds Are So Popular

The most popular bonds that we handle now are Irrigation Bonds. They have displaced, with a large share of our customers, Municipal, Corporation and Public Utility bonds, which pay a lower rate.

When rightly conducted, Irrigation projects now involve no uncertainty. The Government itself is spending tens of millions of dollars in reclaiming this arid land.

The demand for irrigated land exceeds the supply, because of its enormous fertility. And because an unfailing water supply, under constant control, insures one against crop failures.

The most productive and costly farm lands in America are now in the irrigated sections.

Carefully Guarded

The projects which we finance are carefully guarded. Our own engineers and attorneys pass on every feature. An officer of our Company, residing in the West, keeps constantly in touch with every project until the whole work is completed.

We have our pick of these projects, because we are known as the leading dealers in Irrigation bonds. The projects we finance are always well located.

In the past 15 years we have sold 71 separate issues of Reclamation bonds—Drainage and Irrigation—without a dollar of loss to any investor.

The Security

Irrigation bonds are secured by farm liens, given by individual owners in payment for water rights.

These liens are conservative—more so than the usual farm mortgage. They are often for less than one-fourth the land's value.

The first crop from the land is frequently sufficient to pay the whole lien—often by several times over.

In addition, the bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns—the property which the proceeds of the bonds help to build.

Some of these bonds are municipal obligations, issued, like School bonds, by organized districts. Such bonds are tax liens on all the real property in the district.

Some of these bonds are issued subject to the provisions of the Federal law known as the "Carey Act."

The security in all our projects is ideal and ample. It is hard to conceive of anything better.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent. interest—a higher rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

The reason is this: Irrigation projects are profitable. There are few undertakings where such amounts of money can be used to equal advantage.

The demand for irrigated land is now overwhelming. And there is great demand for money that will help to supply it. So the bonds pay this liberal rate.

$100—$500—$1,000

Irrigation bonds are issued in series, usually payable all the way from two to twelve years. One may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

They are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

Ask for Our Book

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds, which every investor, small and large, should read. It is based on our intimate knowledge of the facts, gained by 15 years of experience.

Please send this coupon to-day for it. It will enable you to judge if Irrigation bonds form the sort of investment you seek. (4)

The New Home of the Bowery Mission

HERE may the lost ones gathered in
From the haunts of vice and shame,
With all their bitterness and sin,
Be welcomed "in His Name."
Here may the cold and hungry come,
Seeking for food and care,
And find the comforts of a home
Within these walls so fair.

Here may the "Mother" still lead on,
With gentle, loving hand,
Her motley crowd, so sad, forlorn,
Gathered from many a land.
Here may their hearts grow glad and free,
Finding the needed grace,
Till one and all shall learn to see
The light within this place.

Here may the sad, forsaken one
Find welcome and good cheer,
The loving word, the helping hand,
Within this atmosphere.
Here may the stranger find a friend,
The wanderer cease to roam;
And from this place his footsteps bend
Straight to his early home.

Here may the songs of praise ascend
In many a well-known air.
Here all before the altar bend
In simple, humble prayer.
Here in this home, so beautiful,
May myriads yet arise,
Seeking amid earth's grief and care
A mansion in the skies.

Father, this House we give to thee,
Thy blessing now we claim.
Oh, may this building ever be
An honor to thy name.
Oh, grant thy Spirit full and free,
That as the years shall roll
This sacred temple oft shall be
The birth-place of a soul.

Pittsfield, Me. MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

Whose Boy?

WHOSE boy will next be sacrificed
On fiendish Drink's unhallowed shrine?
Each mother's heart goes up in prayer:
"Not mine, O God—not mine! Not mine
No, not the boy whose bonnie head
So oft I've to my bosom pressed,
While singing low, soft lullabies
That soothed the tired child to rest!

"Oh, can it be that he should fall
A prey to aught so vile as this?
Oh, can it be the tempter's wiles
Should rob my life of all this bliss?
Shall his dear feet be led astray
By this accursed, licensed sin?
This fair young boy, whom Jesus loves,
Be lost, that others gold might win?"

Some mother's boy must fill the ranks,
Some fireside treasure feed the flame,
Whose fiery tongue insatiate burns
And leaves deep scars of sin and shame.
Poor tortured bodies, mangled, bruised,
Wounded too deep for love's sweet balm;
Souls tossed by discord fierce and wild,
That heavenly music cannot calm.

Oh, why should this unholy hand
Write daily horrors on life's page
And sear, as with the breath of hell,
The heart of childhood, young and age?
Alas! a nation yields the right
And kneels in blood at Mammon's shrine.
Whose boy will next be sacrificed?
It may be yours, it may be mine.

World's Temperance Sunday

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE question of temperance has become one which can no longer be ignored. Ministers are awakening to the fact that unless they stand on the side of temperance they lose a large share of their influence and power, and they cannot command the respect of their people. Doctors are examining the matter, and many of the most renowned have declared that alcohol has no nutritive qualities, and that its introduction into the system as a food is most deleterious. The governments of various countries have been forced to consider whether anything can be done to stay the torrent of intemperance among their people.

Our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost; we belong, not to ourselves, but unto Him who has redeemed us. Is it by the authority of God, our rightful owner, that we introduce "a mocker," a raging mocker, into his temple?

The history of the Rechabites, at the time of Judah's defection, shows how God loved and honored those who stood free from that lust of the flesh which ruins so many in our land. Jeremiah the prophet, who was the willing, pliable instrument of God, to speak or not as He would, to do things pleasant or unpleasant—foolish in the eyes of men or wise—was sent by him to the house of the Rechabites. God commanded him to go and bring them into the house of the Lord and to set wine before them. A strange command! Some people are afraid to yield themselves up wholly to God, lest he should ask of them some unheard-of thing.

How, then, did the Rechabites act in these unexpected circumstances? It must at first have been a shock. Jeremiah, well-known for uncompromising piety, could he tempt them to drink wine, and bring them solemnly into the house of his God for that very purpose? Could it be possible that he was acting under the direction of God? Above all, could God disapprove of their abstinence and unworldliness of life? Was such a thing conceivable? The Rechabites did not weigh the matter; they acted on the principle of obedience to their father Jonadab, and said, "We will drink no wine; for Jonadab, the son of Rechab, our father, commanded us, saying, Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye nor your sons for ever; neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any; but all your days ye shall dwell in tents; that ye may live many days in the land wherein ye are strangers. Thus have we obeyed the voice of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, our father, in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine all our days."

Three hundred years had elapsed since the command was given; something like twelve generations had come and gone, and still the descendants of this early abstainer adhered to his principles, and maintained them even under such a trial of faith as we have seen. God took occasion to make them an example to the reprobate inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem, "Will ye not receive instruction to hearken to my words? saith the Lord." And then most touchingly he pleads that the command of Jonadab to his sons, that they should drink no wine, is performed, for unto this day they drink none, notwithstanding that he, their God, had spoken to them, and had also sent prophets, rising early and sending them, yet they had not hearkened unto him. But far from desiring the Rechabites to change their principles, God sent Jeremiah to them with this message: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: because ye have obeyed the commandments of Jonadab, your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according to all that he hath commanded you; Jonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me for ever." God had only tried their faith as a lesson to his people, and as an opportunity of perpetuating blessing to them!

Read how two men make $12,000 a year clear profit on a small egg-farm

FOUR years ago the Cornings, father and son, both in poor health, and with no practical experience, took up egg-raising, on a few acres of land at Bound Brook, N. J., beginning with only thirty hens. To-day they have one of the greatest egg-producing plants in this country, and a business that, with 1953 hens, paid last year a clear profit of more than twelve thousand dollars.

Next year they plan to have 4000 hens. What do you think their profits will be? Get the Farm Journal and find out.

The Corning Egg-Book

(entitled "$6.41 per Hen per Year") tells HOW these two men did it. Not theories, but facts; not air castles, not expectations, but methods, tested and proved by experience. It tells how they found a market eager to get choice eggs at high prices. It tells how they learned to meet that demand with an unfailing supply, in winter as in summer. It tells of their problems and failures, and how they overcame them and won SUCCESS. It gives photographic pictures of their plant, with working drawings of important buildings, etc.

And it gives beginners just the help they need to make money in this unlimited field. Your chances of success are far better than theirs, for you have their experience to guide you. The knowledge which cost the Cornings thousands of dollars and years of experiment is at your command for the price of a dozen eggs.

Here are some of the things that the CORNING EGG-BOOK tells:

The troubles of great hotels in getting reliable eggs.
The prices paid for CORNING eggs throughout the year.
The number of eggs sold each month throughout the year.
How to get the most eggs when other people get none.
When to hatch chicks that are to lay winter eggs.
How to grow juicy broilers in nine weeks.
How to mix the feed that makes the most eggs.
How to prevent the drafts that kill chickens.
How to save 97 per cent. of the young chicks.
Why and how they make the hens scratch for food.
Why they send hens to roost with full crops.
How to make hens attend strictly to business.
Why they raise only white-shelled eggs.
How to have May chicks laying eggs in October.

The Corning Egg-Book is sold in combination with the FARM JOURNAL

to increase its subscription list to ONE MILLION for next year

Farm Journal has for thirty-three years conducted a poultry department known the country over for the ability of its editors and the value of its contents. Besides this strong section, which of itself makes the paper valuable to every chicken owner, its other departments are ably conducted and widely quoted. It is the standard monthly farm and home paper of the country, with already more than three million readers. It is clean, bright, intensely practical; boiled down; cream, not skim-milk. Its editors and contributors know what they are talking about, and can quit when they have said it. It is for the gardner, fruit man, stockman, trucker, farmer, villager, suburbanite, the women folks, the boys and girls. It is illustrated and well printed on good paper. It has not a medical or trashy advertisement in it. More than half a million of its subscribers pay five and ten years ahead—a very remarkable fact.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Little Slaves

IN a book recently published by Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, a realistic picture is given of the condition of children in the mill villages of the South. The author, Sidney McCall, has written a story entitled Red Horse Hill. It is a romance with a motive. Love plays a large part in the narrative, and the people introduced are so tinged with reality that they strongly appeal to the reader, who sees in them typical figures of today. In the first chapter we are introduced to a wife and husband who have not ceased to be sweethearts, who, in fact, are more deeply in love each with the other after several years of wedded life than when they pledged their troth at the altar. We soon discover that there is a mystery, to which we have no clue; that the wife has a secret of which the husband is ignorant; and that, for some untold reason, beneath luxury, wealth and success, there is something that menaces the future peace of the household. Gradually we ascertain that the wife has been previously married, and that in her former marriage she had a child, who was torn from her arms. Whether the child is living or dead she does not know.

In the development of the story the child is restored to her, but the very restoration involves a terrible tragedy. The husband is a prosperous mill-owner, who has recently come from the North to reside in the neighborhood of his mill. Here toiling at the loom, with other little slaves, is the baby whom the mother lost years ago. To tell more of the story would be unfair. Merely as a novel it is well worth the widest reading, and compares favorably with anything in fiction issued during the last twelvemonth. Its greatest power, however, and its deepest interest for the student of sociology is its unveiling of the hideous misery of white children compelled, from the poverty or cupidity of their parents and the merciless will of tyrannical overseers, to toil all day at tasks beyond their strength. The little black children in the slave cabins of the South before the Civil War had a free and happy time. They played with the master's children, had enough to eat and a place to sleep, and were almost as unfettered as birds on the bough. Far different is the situation of children in mill villages.

A wretched creature, known as a whipper-in, goes about in search of any who are absent from their places, and sometimes drives them at the point of the lash back from their beds to their place at the loom. A vivid scene may be quoted. Certainly nothing more convincing has been written concerning the little white slaves. Dr. Singleterry, an old friend of Mrs. Alden, had been calling at her house. He is taking leave of her at the door, and she catches a glimpse of a group standing in the road and gazing at the house.

"Those children—oh, can they be really children? They are stopping."

He glanced over his shoulder. "Why, that's only a handful of the mill children," he said. "Have you seen none before? They have stopped to admire the house."

"Let them look," she panted. "But I cannot stop to see them. Those are not children—they are little ghosts of children already dead. I did not know that in the world there were such children. I must go." She vanished into the shadow of the hall, and he heard the sound of frantic feet running up the stairway. Then a chamber door was shut with such violence that the house reverberated. Afterward a great silence came.

The little girls, fifteen or more in number, had stopped to gaze in, open-mouthed, at the lady who was acting so strangely. As she vanished, all the faded eyes were on Dr. Singleterry, now moving slowly down the cemented path toward them. At first it seemed that they would scatter, like a group of frightened animals; but, reassured by the gentleness of his face and manner, they stood still, watching his approach.

All were small and thin. The head of one girl rose a few inches above the rest, and it could be seen that she was the dominant spirit of the little flock. All were attired in scanty garments (the waist and skirt being sewed together) of faded blue denim, or unbleached cotton stuff, and many were barefoot in the chill March wind. . . .

"How is it that you little girls are out of the mill on a Monday forenoon?" Dr. Singleterry asked.

"Boiler's busted, God be praised," responded Minnie, briefly. She paused and gave a sort of elfin grin. Something in the rhythm of the words attracted her. "Boiler's busted, God be praised," she repeated, in a higher key. As she spoke the words she took a little dancing, sidewise step. She threw back her head and laughed discordantly. "Ef it warn't fer de good ole boiler we'd be dancin' now, you bet —dancin' de devil's quadrille. Come on, kids! De ole gent never danced dat dance. Let's show him a figger uv de devil's quadrille!"

With a dramatic force as strong as it was repellant, Minnie threw herself into the part of a "spooler," her eyes shifting incessantly from part to part of the long imaginary "side," where the reels revolve, her thin legs leaping from right to left, now an inch backward, now an inch forward, as she leaned over the frame, the claw of her upraised hand ready for its predatory downward swoop on the first broken skein.

The other children, following with marvelous quickness, ranged themselves back to back, facing two long, imaginary "sides," set in a space too narrow. "Bur-r-ruh! Wheeze-eeze-eeze!" began Minnie, in imitation of the buzz of wheels, the multitudinous whine of myriad twisting strands. "You start up de clatterin' down dare, Bessie Peters—you an' Beck Jones," commanded she. Delighted to obey, they raised shrill voices. Now all were at the new, exciting game. The noise grew louder, the twitching motions of the dancers more exaggerated. At the far end the littlest girl danced like a loosened nerve of energy, her dark eyes bright with fun.

The minister stood as one paralyzed. Slow tears stole out unheeded to find the silver furrows of his face.

A civilization which crushes children under its Juggernaut wheels is surely challenging judgment to come. Somehow, as we think of it, we are compelled to feel that we share the responsibility of those who are immediately engaged in this unhallowed traffic. The question arises in our hearts, Is there not something we can do to stop this wholesale slaughter of body and soul that is going on in this country among the little white slaves?

CAREFUL DOCTOR

Prescribed Change of Food Instead of Drugs.

It takes considerable courage for a doctor to deliberately prescribe only food for a despairing patient, instead of resorting to the usual list of medicines.

There are some truly scientific physicians among the present generation who recognize and treat conditions as they are and should be treated regardless of the value to their pockets. Here's an instance.

"Four years ago I was taken with severe gastritis and nothing would stay on my stomach, so that I was on the verge of starvation.

"I heard of a doctor who had a summer cottage near me—a specialist from N. Y., and as a last hope sent for him.

"After he examined me carefully he advised me to try a small quantity of Grape-Nuts at first, then as my stomach became stronger to eat more.

"I kept at it and gradually got so I could eat and digest three teaspoonfuls Then I began to have color in my face, memory became clear, where before everything seemed a blank. My limbs got stronger and I could walk. So I steadily recovered.

"Now, after a year on Grape-Nuts I weigh 153 lbs. My people were surprised at the way I grew fleshy and strong on this food,"

Prayer on the Battlefield

A WRITER in the New York Tribune relates some interesting anecdotes of the Army career of the late Major-General Howard, who passed away two weeks ago. He writes:

When Howard commanded the Eleventh Army Corps it was made up of foreigners. Many accounts were received from the front, in which the "psalm-singing soldier" was held up to ridicule; but these reports had no effect on the conduct of Howard, who always found time for religious services, and never began an important move without asking the aid of God. He was asked once by a civilian:

"Is there not much prejudice among soldiers against the Christian in the military service?"

"Oh, no," said General Howard; "on the contrary, the soldiers, all things being equal, relied more upon the man who feared God and tried to keep his commandments. Because a man was a Christian he lost no credit either with his company or with his commander."

After his regular Army life began, Howard soon had occasion to show his colors. It was at a Methodist revival, when he was stationed in Florida. At the close of a meeting, when the minister had preached on experimental religion, a call was made for inquirers. No one responded at first, while certain young men seemed to ridicule the situation. Howard wouldn't stand that. He went forward, his sword clattering at his heel, and knelt at the altar. The men knew Howard the fighter, and the ridicule ceased at once.

Like Havelock and Stonewall Jackson, he always offered prayer before joining battle. There is a good story told of Howard's rebuke to a teamster, a profane one, who was trying to start a balky mule. "Excuse me, general," said the offender. "I did not know you were present." With great dignity the general replied, "I prefer, sir, that you abstain from swearing from a higher and better motive than because of my presence."

Sherman understood Howard's religion. He once said: "Howard is different from us; he believes in his religion."

Just before the capture of Savannah, General Howard and General Sherman went down the Ogeechee River in a small boat, to confer with Admiral Dahlgren to arrange for the final attack on that city. On finding that Fort MacAlliste had been carried and that the Army and Navy were again in communication, General Sherman was much elated and jubilant, and soon after they embarked he said:

"I feel good; I want to sing or shout, but my musical education was neglected. Boys [to the staff officers in the boat], can't you sing something?"

The "boys" seemed at a loss.

"Howard," said the general, "I know you can sing, for I have heard you."

"But, general," replied Howard, "I can't sing anything but hymn tunes. I don't know anything else."

"Those will be just as good as anything else," said the commanding general. "Sing them." And so, as they ran down to the fleet, Howard made the air ring with "Shining Shore," "Homeward Bound" and "Rock of Ages," the staff officers joining in and Sherman occasionally attempting a stave or two.

Over Sixty Years Wedded

VERY remarkable in some respects has been the domestic experience of Mr. and Mrs. Peter Campbell, formerly of Washington County, N. Y., and now of Wray, Colo. They were married on October 30, 1848, and have three children, all of whom are still living and prosperous. There has not been a single break in this household circle in sixty years

Fifty years ago the Ostermoor Trade-mark was sewed on mattresses that have been in use ever since and are as comfortable to-day as when bought.

Do not believe any mattress to be a genuine Ostermoor until you find sewn on the end the trade-mark label bearing this figure.

The Mattress That is Built—Not Stuffed

Ostermoor $15.

Note the name "Ostermoor" woven continuously in the binding.

This Mattress is Positively

Proof Against Dampness, Dust, Vermin, Germs

is firmly elastic and evenly soft in every spot, and remains so indefinitely.

The advent of the Ostermoor in 1853 marked the passing of the unsanitary hair mattress.

The remarkable popularity of the Ostermoor since then has given rise to many imitations. These imitations resemble the Ostermoor in outward appearance only; the superiority of the Ostermoor is inside. Many people testify that their Ostermoors, in use from twenty-five to fifty-two years, are to-day as good as new.

Buy what you wish, but don't believe any mattress to be Ostermoor which does not bear the Ostermoor trade-mark, and do not judge the Ostermoor by the mattress you are told is just as good.

The Battle of the Slums*

THE church was a long time in learning that true Christianity was only altruism in its highest form, though that was the burning and oft-repeated message of our Saviour. It takes no seer to detect the immeasurable gulf between living for mere self-improvement, as did the old anchorites, and living for others, as we are taught to do to-day.

One difficulty confronts many slum-workers in America, which does not hamper those in some other countries. The dwellers in most of our so-called slums are apparently contented and happy. In cases where "model tenements" have been provided for them, they have sometimes disliked them so much that they have actually deserted them for their old cramped and filthy homes.

There is little hope for such people, excepting through their children. They may be taught to love better things. Therefore our missionaries have established children's clubs and playgrounds, kindergartens and manual-training classes. Get hold of the slum children. If they could all be rescued, a generation or two more would banish the slum entirely.

It is in the slums that our epidemics usually start. It is there that vice breeds—drunkenness, impurity, political corruption. Granting that much of sin exists in high places, still most of the evils in our cities are dependent for their continued existence, in the long view, upon the slum.

"You cannot," says Bishop Williams, "let ignorance breed unchecked in the slums and keep your politics pure and clean. Though you rent the highest-priced pew in the most fashionable church, and patronize the most approved private schools, you cannot let miasma reek in the Tenderloin and keep your children pure. God is enforcing the solidarity of human society in these days under the most awful of sanctions."

The country has its slums no less than the city, in proportion to its population. Even in some of the hill towns of New England, there are remote neighborhoods in which morality is unknown. Under the shadow of sublime mountains, beside romantic lakes, abandoned people are living in miserable shacks and shanties, and are leading lives as sordid and unsavory as any on the East Side of New York.

A man who has worked for three years among the poor of Boston says that they are best approached by those who have risen from among their own kind, or who are only a grade above them. Such workers understand the situation and how to meet it better than others possibly can.

John G. Paton worked and suffered for years among the New Hebrides when suddenly multitudes there were converted through the fiery sermon of a half-naked chief. The Rev. Rollin H. Walker reminds us that more people are converted in India by the illiterate Hindustani preachers, who sit down on the doorsteps and sing and talk to the people, than by the educated missionaries from Europe and America.

The moral which Dr. Walker draws from this is not that refined and educated men and women should not engage in slum work; but that they should be constantly trying to train the converts from the slums to be preachers and teachers there.

Our prayer should echo George Matheson's: "Let my wealth be the Beautiful Gate—may I spend for the hungry! Let my health be the Beautiful Gate—may I work for the toiling! Let my pain itself be the Beautiful Gate—in sorrow may I trace the secret of human brotherhood!"

*Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, November 28. TEXT: Luke 14: 15-23.

Abstinence and Strength*

THE prodigal way in which mankind has ever thrown away its strength is one of the most discouraging lessons which one gleans from the pages of history, where the Daniels and the Pauls are rare. To give full rein to inclination and appetite—to use superior strength chiefly to crush the weak, to then revel shamefully in the power thus acquired; this is, in brief, the story of the majority of men and of nations.

Prophets arose and warned them. Poets and preachers over and over rehearsed the moral lessons which were everywhere behind and around them—but "Israel would not learn, my people would not consider."

In this new century, it would seem as though the race had somehow imbibed wisdom. In certain parts of the world, there are no signs of it; but in others, especially in our own land, the whole horizon is aglow with the rose-light of promise.

The Anti-Saloon League, and other temperance organizations, have worked unceasingly to secure local option laws in States, counties and cities. These laws are believed to offer not only an index to public opinion, such as has never before been shown, but a practicable mode of suppressing the liquor traffic.

Twenty-four States now have given to their people local option laws, by counties or by towns. Nine States have actually passed strict prohibition laws. Where local option prevails, an enormous proportion of the counties and towns have gone "dry."

In the South this movement has acquired surprising strength. One-half of the counties in South Carolina had already voted out the liquor traffic when, last August, a new election test occurred. This revealed the fact that sixteen additional counties were against the vile business. Only six of the counties in that leading State remain "wet," and the next Legislature will unquestionably pass a State prohibitory law.

Alabama has just enacted a stringent statute, which will aid in enforcing the State prohibitory law.

Florida is expected to vote for the abolition of the saloon, and it is hoped that Arkansas and Texas will go "dry" when their legislators next vote.

In New York State, long a stronghold of the liquor and beer forces, there has been a recent increase of 26 in the number of "dry" towns, until now 340 of the towns in the State are free from the saloon curse. There are still 323 "wet" towns, while 270 are partly "wet" and partly "dry." The Anti-Saloon League confidently expects that the New York Legislature will soon pass a bill for local option in the cities of the State, which can then vote out the saloon by wards.

This powerful society has done noble work. The recent victories for temperance have been due almost entirely to the League's efforts. All parties, and all other temperance organizations, have united with them, and the fight will be kept up to the bitter end.

Every member of our great society should belong to some active temperance organization, and no member should ever enter a saloon, unless for missionary work.

Many young men say, "I went in simply to get a 'soft' drink; I took nothing but milk, or ginger ale."

But, all the same, you put money into the saloon-keeper's till. Buy your "soft" drinks somewhere else. Do nothing to strengthen the power of the saloon. It is one of the greatest enemies of the home and the church.

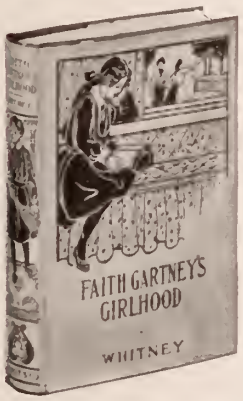
FAITH GARTNEY'S GIRLHOOD
By MRS. WHITNEY

is the most famous of Mrs. Whitney's books. This story, the writer says, was begun for young girls, but grew with them to womanhood.



THE GAYWORTHY'S
by the same author, is presented by us for the first time this season.

A SUMMER IN LESLIE GOLDTHWAITE'S LIFE
is the title of another most enjoyable book by Mrs. Whitney, well-known to all.

Mrs. Whitney is deservedly one of the most famous of modern authors, not only because of her thorough knowledge of the manners and character of the persons of whom she writes, but also because of her sympathetic sentiments. These are all large volumes of nearly 400 pages each, well printed, and bound in colored cloth covers.

HELEN'S BABIES—By JOHN HABBERTON

contains more merriment than any other book extant, and at the same time is wonderfully interesting. A masterpiece in every sense of the word, it awakens intense admiration while it produces hearty laughter. Budge and Teddy, "the best children in the world," are consigned to the care of their Uncle Harry, while their parents spend a fortnight with a friend, and at once the fun begins. The children cause their uncle no end of worriment. But though veritable imps, the boys are charming little fellows, and it is utterly impossible not to love them. The book is attractively bound in cloth, 12mo. size.

is the greatest and most popular of American novels. Millions of copies of it have been sold, and never was the sale so great as in recent years. The secret of its wonderfnl hold upon the reading public is probably due to the fact that it is a novel of intense dramatic interest and extraordinary power, united with the element of human interest; it is pervaded with a deep spiritual tone, and inculcates an absorbing moral lesson. Until recently the price has been $2.00 per copy.

Every book in this list has, in its turn, been the Favorite of the American Public, and they have all enjoyed an enormous sale for years. You know them all.

HANS BRINKER, or THE SILVER SKATES—By MARY MAPES DODGE

Both boys and girls will find this a most delightful story. The adventures of Hans and Gretel presents an object lesson of Courage and Nobility of Character that will appeal to all alike, while the description of Life in the picturesque land of dikes, dunes, ducks and quaintly dressed, fun-loving, hospitable people will be of the greatest interest to those who are fond of Stories of Travel and Adventure. If Mrs. Dodge had done nothing more than write this book her place would be forever secure in the affection of our young readers. Numerous beautiful and instructive illustrations

DOC GORDON
By MARY E. WILKINS-FREEMAN

Doc Gordon will hold the interest from the opening chapters to the last line. The plot baffles the reader's ingenuity and maintains his interest to the very end. Could David Harum be brought back to life he would find himself cast into utter darkness in the matter of horse-trading. For years he was the synonym for all that is cleverest, sharpest and most amusing, but now a rival not only challenges but eclipses, his honors. The rival is Doc Gordon, of Alton, N. J., a man of mystery even to the villagers and farmers among whom he passes his days. It is the most amusing and unusual anecdote of the year. Strange enough it has a thrilling, well nigh tragic sequel, which adds new and strange interest to the tale.

Dedicating the Bowery Mission

A Week of Public Exercises with Many Eminent Speakers—Thirty Years of Gospel Work Reviewed

AFTER over a year spent in construction and alteration the new Bowery Mission, at 227 Bowery, near Rivington Street, was opened for services on Sunday, November 7, and its friends from far and near gathered at the dedicatory exercises, which extended throughout the week and closed with a great evangelistic service on the evening of November 14. It was a week of joy and gratitude for those who have worked to make the famous Mission a success, from Dr. Hallimond, the superintendent, and dear Mother Bird, down to the men who are just beginning to find their way, under the leadership of the mission workers, to the new and better life.

The services brought together clergymen of note in the various denominations; philanthropists; personal workers who are giving all of the time they can spare from their daily labors to the herculean task of saving men, body and soul, on the Bowery; redeemed men by the score who were saved in meetings in the old Mission from a life of despair, sin and degradation, and are now fired with zeal to help on the good work in the new. Then there were the men of the Bowery themselves, the men for whom the Mission hall was planned and built, and to many of whom, in its first few days, it has proved the bright gateway to better things.

These men of the streets, in their weary tramp up and down the Bowery, have often paused before the inviting front of the new building and inquired anxiously when it would be completed, and for them dedication week was full of interest. These homeless men felt it was the one place above all others in all the city where they would be heartily welcome, where kindly men would meet them with an extended hand and speak no words of reproach for sins committed, for lives ill-spent. It was no wonder then that at every meeting these men filled every seat from aisle to wall, that they applauded the speakers, keenly appreciated the beautiful music of voice and organ, and joined in the hymns—for was not this their hall?

On the opening Sunday there was, first of all, "Mother" Bird's meeting, led by the sweet-faced, gentle lady whose name it bears. Mother Bird has given her life to the service of others. Many a man who is now prosperous and happy she persuaded to leave sin behind. She mingles kind words with kindly deeds in such generous proportions that it is small wonder that the men for whom she is doing so much regard her with a feeling akin to reverence. Mrs. Bird, after a few words, turned the meeting over to Dr. Hallimond, who read from I. Kings, eighth chapter, and delivered a beautiful prayer of dedication.

Dr. Louis Klopsch delivered a short address, telling of the plans which were made for the new Mission about a year ago. He said they had no idea that they would have such an extensive and beautiful building as the one in which they were at the present time gathered. "At that time," said Dr. Klopsch, "I pledged that the Mission, whatever it might cost, would be dedicated free of debt, and every bill has been met, leaving the Mission free to carry on its great and glorious work unhampered." All felt it was a great event in the history of Christian work in New York when he declared, in closing, "the Bowery Mission dedicated, free of debt, to the service of Almighty God and the uplift of fallen humanity."

Dr. A. F. Schauffler, president of the New York City Mission and Tract Society, preached an inspiring sermon in which our lives were compared to a ship, with the Bible as our guide to conduct, our compass, and Christ our captain and pilot. It was a sermon of hope to those who made up the audience, and it could be seen that each telling point made a deep impression on the auditors. In the afternoon Dr. Klopsch conducted a children's song service, and for the time being the two charities which are nearest his heart and to which, for many years, he has given thought and attention were represented under the same roof—the Bowery Mission and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn—for all of the little singers had been guests at the Children's Paradise during the past summer. They were charmed with the beautiful hall and seemed loath to leave, gathering about Dr. Klopsch much as they are accustomed to do after he has spoken to them in the Chapel at Mont-Lawn.

In the evening Rt. Rev. James H. Darlington, D.D., Bishop of Harrisburg, was the preacher. Before the service the Bishop and the superintendent, Dr. Hallimond, led a procession of several hundred redeemed men from the meeting room of the Bowery Mission Brotherhood around to the main hall, where the service was held.

Every night following there was a thronged meeting at the Mission, with speakers known for their effective appeals to men; well-known clergymen and some of the most noted singers of New York, who gladly lent their services to the Mission. To the visitors who had never attended the Mission meetings, the testimonies of men who have been saved through its influence were of intense interest. Men who had been physical and spiritual wrecks stood up, glad to tell of their wonderful experience and of their complete regeneration through the Christlike spirit they had found within its walls. There was no attempt at oratory, but each man spoke from a full heart and with a sincerity that carried with it the conviction of the truth of what he said. What life-stories they were! They were so full at first of tragedy and pathos, and then so full of joy that the old self had been left behind and that God had created in them a new heart. Not one closed without making a strong appeal to the men in the audience to accept the new life so freely offered. After each meeting the men in the audience were given refreshments in the basement, while the visitors were shown over the new building by Dr. Hallimond and the officers and ushers. A complete account of the new structure, written by Dr. Hallimond, has already been given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for October 27.

Rev. W. C. Stinson, D.D., of the Bloomingdale Reformed Church, spoke on Monday night, and characterized the Bowery Mission as a place where men

The Front of the New Mission

Showing the four windows representing the Prodigal Son could find their better selves. Rev. Wallace McMullen, D.D., pastor of the Madison Avenue M. E. Church, and Dr. J. Wesley Hill, of the Metropolitan Temple, were the speakers the next evening. Dr. Hill spoke of himself as an object lesson of what God may accomplish in the souls of men, as he himself had been in despair at one time in his early manhood, out of work and drifting far from Christian influences. As he had been brought back, so could others. Speakers of the other evenings of the week were Rev. James M. Farrar, D.D., of the First Reformed Church of Brooklyn; Rev. George Alexander, D.D., of the University Place Presbyterian Church; Dr. C. E. Jefferson, of the Broadway Tabernacle, and Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart.

The three evangelistic services, one on Saturday night and two on Sunday, brought together the foremost mission workers in New York.

At the Saturday evening service the leader was Mr. J. H. Wyburn, formerly superintendent of the Bowery Mission and now superintendent of the McAuley Mission. The speakers included Miss Sara Wray, of the Eighth Avenue Mission; Mr. John Hollis, of the Living Waters Mission; Mr. T. C. Roberts-Horsefield, of the Brooklyn City Mission; Mr. C. D. Usinger, of Faith Mission.

At the afternoon evangelistic service on Sunday, November 14, the leader was Rev. John Callahan, of Hadley Rescue Hall. The speakers were Chaplain Sanderson, Rev. John R. Henry, D.D., of the Church of All Nations; Rev. William James, of Camp Memorial Church; Rev. George S. Avery, of Chester Crest, Mount Vernon, N. Y.; Rev. Joseph Conway, superintendent of the Florence Mission, and Mr. Thomas Anderson.

The evening service was led by Senator Reuben L. Gledhill, and the assisting speakers included Mr. George Corfield, of Jersey City; Mr. Stafford Wright, of the Seamen's Mission, and Mr. Don Shelton, president of the National Bible Institute. The last Sunday morning service was in charge of Rev. A. F. Underhill, D.D., assistant rector of the Church of the Ascension.

The music throughout the week was of a very high order. Men and women well known in the musical circles of the metropolis came, in turn, to sing for the men of the Bowery. It is well known that the volunteer concerts given during the winter bring to the Bowery Mission musicians of a high order, who would give their services to no other cause.

As the visitors left the last service they felt it a mistake to say that Dedication Week was over, for they knew from what they had seen that at every meeting in the years to come men would there dedicate their lives and hearts to Christ and the service of their fellows, and would go forth from the Bowery Mission to look the world in the face and prove by their after lives that the efforts in their behalf had not gone for nought nor the prayers for their redemption been spoken in vain.

As the Bowery Mission begins its work in its new home a brief survey of its remarkable soul-saving work for the last thirty years will not be out of place. Rev. A. Ruliffson and his wife, both devoted Christian workers, had become interested in the people of New York's East Side, and felt that the call had come to them to do something for their spiritual condition. They consulted with Jerry McAuley, of the famous Water Street Mission, and, encouraged by him, they opened a Gospel Mission in a small room at 36 Bowery. They labored alone at first, but their faith in God was rewarded; friends came to them, and donations for the work increased until they were able to seek larger quarters, which the growth of the work warranted.

The founder of the Mission died in 1894, and it seemed for a time as if its great and much-needed work would come to an end, but Dr. Klopsch, having become thoroughly acquainted with what the Mission had accomplished and the crying need of the district in which it was placed, declared that he would see to it that its work should go on and that this Christian lighthouse on the Bowery should still shine a beacon of hope to the weary and lost. In 1895 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD took charge, and the Mission was incorporated in 1897.

The way in which Dr. Klopsch had his attention called to the Bowery Mission is of much interest. In 1890 he was returning from a tour in Palestine, and stopped for a day at historic Smyrna. He attended a mission service in the evening and heard the superintendent give his testimony. He said he had walked the Bowery of New York a drunkard for six years. One night he entered the Bowery Mission and found the Saviour. Dr. Klopsch was much impressed, and this incident did much toward influencing his decision to aid the Mission. Under the control of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the Mission entered on a wider field of usefulness. It aided poor families, rescued men from lives of sin and encouraged them to begin a new life under the leadership of Christ. It established a bread line, which, some nights in winter, feeds from two thousand to twenty-five hundred homeless men. It has established the most efficient labor bureau for the unemployed in all Greater New York, and not only secures work for men in the city, but sends them long distances to work on farms. Some have even gone beyond the Mississippi, to places the Mission has provided. So careful and efficient is the Mission management that its methods are studied by both Christian workers and philanthropists who wish to help their fellow-men on purely sociological lines. After several changes, the Mission was established for a number of years at 55 Bowery, but the building of the new Manhattan Bridge and the widening of the approaches compelled the Mission to seek new quarters. At last 227 Bowery was decided upon as an excellent location, and a hall was hired temporarily until the new Mission was completed. The new Mission was planned after much careful thought on the part of Dr. Klopsch and his assistants, as it was to meet not the needs of to-day alone, but an even more extensive work for men in the future.

A LITTLE TOUR AROUND GALILEE

By PROF. M. P. YOUNG

Assiut College, Assiut, Egypt*

NO name has a more musical sound than that which characterizes the little district of northern Palestine known as Galilee. It is a land of springs and rivers, of gently undulating hills, covered with a carpet of green, and of vineyards and orchards. Little surprising is it that it touches a more sympathetic chord in the affection of mankind than the bleak and barren hills of Judea, that are suggestive of nothing save the cold formalism of Jewish rabbis.

All races that have ever lived within its borders have developed national characteristics that may be attributed directly to its fruitful influences.

In the beginning of Israel's existence as a nation it was occupied by the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali on the north and by Asher and Issachar on the south. All four alike kept aloof from the great historical movement of Israel. With the exception of their rally around Barak and Gideon they scarcely ever appear in Jewish history. To them the busy problems of the world held a more enchanting interest than the life of religious seclusion that was so reverenced by their Judean neighbors. Asher was "blessed with children acceptable to his neighbors, dipping his foot in the oil of his olive groves." Naphtali was "as a spreading terebinth of the Lebanon forest; he putteth out goodly boughs and is satisfied with favor and full of the blessings of the Lord."

From the earliest times the Jews of Judea looked upon Galilee with contempt. Little sympathy did they have with those who would dare carry on commerce with the Gentiles and become engrossed in anything save the searching out in Rabbinical records of those things concerning their religious superiority. Twenty of her cities were actually annexed by Solomon to the adjacent kingdom of Tyre and formed, with their territory, the "coasts" of Tyre and Sidon. In the time of the Christian era, thus inferiority was still felt, and the speech of Galileans still "bewrayed" them by its uncouth pronunciation. The saying of a certain Judean was the embodiment of the national spirit of all Judea, "Out of Galilee there ariseth no prophet."

Even from the standpoint of history, the Galileans were a people of "no mean" country. Previous to the exile, Galilee had traditions, a prophetic succession, and a history almost as splendid as Judah's own. She was not out of the great scenes of famous days. Carmel, Kishon, Megiddo, Jezreel, Gilboa, Shunem, Tabor, Gilead, Bashan, the waters of Merom, Hazor and Kadesh were all within touch or sight. Galilee, therefore, lived as openly as Judea in the face of the glories of her people. Her latent fires had everywhere visible provocation. The foot of the invader could tread no league of her soil without starting the voices of fathers who had fought for her—without rewaking promises which the greatest prophets had lavished upon her. "As in the former times he brought into contempt the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali, so in the latter times hath he made them glorious, the way of the sea across Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles. The people which walked in darkness have seen a great light; dwellers in the land of darkness, on them hath the light shined." While Judea's religion had for its characteristic zeal for the law, Galilee was distinguished by the nobler, the more potential passion of hope. Therefore it was to Galilee that Jesus came preaching, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand"; it was the Galilean patriotism which he chose to refine to diviner issues.

Of all characteristics of the Galileans there are none that stand out more prominently than faithfulness and impetuousness.

> Zebulun was a people jeoparding their life to the death,
> And Naphtali on the high places of the field.

From among them come the chief zealots and the wildest fanatics of the Roman wars. We remember two Galileans who wished to call down fire from heaven on those who were discourteous to them. Their fidelity, often unreasoning and ill-tempered, was always sincere. For this cause our Lord chose his friends from among this people, and it was not a Galilean who betrayed him.

But of all Galilee the little city of Nazareth interests us most. Unknown and unnamed in the Old Testament, it first appears as the retired abode of the humble carpenter. The description of the old topographer, Quoresimus, is as accurate as it is poetic: "Nazareth is a rose and, like a rose, has the same rounded form, enclosed by the mountains as the flower by its leaves."

Its wild character, high up among the Galilean hills, may account both for the roughness of its population, unable to appreciate their own Prophet, and for the evil reputation which it had acquired even in the surrounding villages, one of whose inhabitants, Nathanael of Cana, said, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?"

From the general fact that it is not mentioned often in the Bible it is supposed that it is shut in from the world, and that Christ spent his childhood in seclusion.

Far is this from correct; few places were more in the midst of the world's activities. Opposite to Nazareth there emerged from the Samarian hills the road to Jerusalem, thronged annually with pilgrims going up to the feast, and with Assyrian caravans, as they ever passed down into Egypt with gold and frankincense and myrrh. The Midianites' caravans

To Make a Hundred Homes Happy

By J. G. HALLIMOND

DWELLERS in the great cities owe civilization a grudge. It has robbed them of many of those rich idyllic joys of home that Robert Burns declared to be

> The true pathos and sublime
> Of human life.

Fancy, if you can, Burns living in a squalid city tenement and writing "The Cotter's Saturday Night"!

Ralph Waldo Emerson said he "always suffered some loss of faith on entering cities." After many years' experience as a Christian worker in great cities, I can quite appreciate Emerson's feelings. Firmly as I believe in the unfailing wisdom and the limitless love of the Almighty, I am flung up, almost every day, against problems that baffle and bewilder me and shake my faith to its foundations.

Poverty is one of them. Not the poverty from which the great men of the world have so often emerged—the poverty of the log cabin, or the tow-path; of the highland glen, or the backwoods, where there is, at any rate, an abundance of pure air to be breathed, and sparkling water to drink—but the poverty of the reeking tenements and of the squalid slums. The poverty that means dirt, filth, disease, ignorance and drunkenness; the poverty that is forever filling the jails, the hospitals, the insane asylums and suicides' graves; the poverty that is murdering tens of thousands by consumption alone; flinging miserable women on the streets, and digging the graves of myriads of children—poor, stunted and starved little mortals.

Meanwhile, to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in a pre-eminent degree, is assigned the duty of alleviation. To mitigate the misery, to assuage the suffering, to lessen the woe, to palliate the pain, to soften the sorrows of the very poor, is an especially imperative task at Thanksgiving time.

The best informed charity agents and Settlement workers are agreed that at least twenty-five per cent. of the inhabitants of New York City, even in this period of unprecedented prosperity, are living in conditions of dire and grinding poverty.

In a recent report of the Department of Corrections the appalling fact is revealed that one in every ten persons who die in New York is buried at public expense, in Potter's Field.

The prevalence of sickness among the very poor of the city is another terrible ingredient in their bitter cup. It is possible for rich people to escape much of the misery, as well as the pain, of sickness. Not so the poor. Oh, the excruciating wretchedness of those stifling hot rooms; and, oh, the maddening irritation of those street noises and disturbances to the sick poor!

Robert Hunter tells of visiting the family of a street-paving-gang man, who was sick. They were a family of seven. They lived in a two-room apartment of a rear tenement. The husband had just been brought home. The wife, nearly distracted, moved about among the clamoring children. The air was steamy with a half-finished washing. Remnants of the last meal lay upon the table. A crying baby and the sick husband occupied the only bed. This was the problem. To cook and wash for seven, to nurse a crying baby, to care for a delirious husband, to arrange a possible sleeping place for seven—to do all these things in two small rooms, opening on an alley, from which proceeded noxious odors and discordant cries.

Do you realize what heroism there is in some of these poverty-stricken sufferers? Oh, how often have I come across poor fellows who, sick enough themselves to be laid on a hospital cot, have continued to toil to save others from starvation.

An Italian workman, dying of consumption, said to a friend who was urging him, as a last hope, to quit work and go to a hospital, "No! no! Me die not yet at all! Me gotta bringa de grub to ma chil'."

As I write these lines, members of our Bowery Mission Brotherhood are busy seeking out the most needy families in the city, in order that Thanksgiving morning a goodly supply of food, clothing and other necessaries be put within their reach, with which to make, at any rate, that one day in the year bright and bearable. As a general rule the most extreme cases of need will have to be sought for.

In a barely furnished room, at the rear of a tenement building, sits an old lady. She is gentle and refined. Her sweet, low voice bespeaks her culture. In a dim light she is sewing, and by the proceeds of her needle endeavoring to keep herself out of the almshouse. Her husband lies in the city hospital, from which he will never emerge alive. He was a member of our Brotherhood for a few months. Quiet and reticent, he never spoke of his penury or need, nor did we become aware of his trying circumstances till we visited him in the hospital. One of the hundred Thanksgiving dinner baskets will go to the lonely old lady.

Another will be given to a young mother of five children, who, during the past few years, has struggled hard by dressmaking to keep them alive, and whose efforts in this direction have been continually interrupted by periods of nursing, for each one of her children has been attacked, some of them more than once, by serious illness.

One of our brethren, visiting one of the tenements, accidentally opened the door of one of the rooms and found a woman on her knees praying, in an agony of earnestness, for bread for herself and children. When she rose, she nearly swooned with strong emotion and gratitude at this remarkable and instant answer to her prayers. We did not wait for Thanksgiving Day. Provisions, clothing and coal were hurried to the place.

At nine o'clock on Thanksgiving Day our beautiful new Bowery Mission Auditorium will be crowded with mothers, whose homes have been visited and whose needs have been ascertained, and as their names are called they will step forward and receive a basket. This basket will, in all cases, contain sufficient provisions for a Thanksgiving dinner for five persons—chickens, vegetables, bread, tea, coffee, sugar, milk, crullers and fruit. In many cases there will also be given other essential things, such as shoes, socks, soap, towels and handkerchiefs.

The opportunity presented in New York City for securing a perfectly happy Thanksgiving Day by ministering to the needs of the most needy is also available, to a greater or less extent, in every city, town and village in the United States.

Meanwhile, we will be glad to have the co-operation of any CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who wish to have a share in the furnishing forth of these Thanksgiving dinner baskets, which will make fully five hundred inmates in one hundred homes of poverty happy for a day at least. Any gifts for this work may be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which will make due acknowledgment of the same.

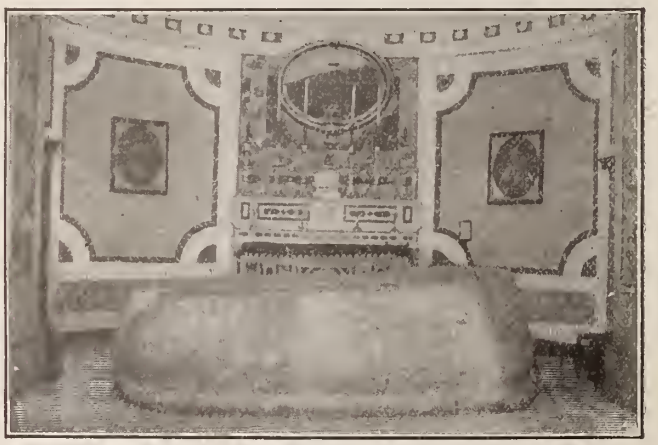
Water-Carriers of Nazareth



The Legendary "Table of the Last Supper"

could be watched for miles coming up from the fords of the Jordan. Running among the hills from Damascus to Phœnicia was the great artery of commerce alluded to by Isaiah as "the way of the sea." Or if the village boys climbed the hill there was another road in sight, where the companies were still more brilliant—the highway between Acre and Decapolis, upon which legions marched and princes swept with their retinues, and all sort of travelers went to and fro. The Roman ranks, the wealth of noblemen's equipages, cannot have been strange to the eyes of the boys of Nazareth.

Here then, within the little village of Nazareth, lived the spotless youth as he drank in the meaning of the busy world around him. It was up and down these roads that the immortal figures of the parables passed. By them come the merchantman seeking goodly pearls, the king departing to receive his kingdom, the friend on a journey, the householder arriving suddenly upon his servants, the prodigal son coming back from a far country. The far-off country! What a meaning has this frequent phrase of Christ's when you stand in Galilee by one of her great roads, roads which so easily carried willing feet from the pious homes of Asher and Naphtali to the harlot cities of Phœnicia—roads which were in touch with Rome and Babylon!

A Shepherd of Galilee Leading His Flock

It was thus amid these busy scenes that He grew up and suffered temptation, "who was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." The perfection of his purity and patience was not easily achieved as behind a wide fence that shut the world out, but amid rumor and scandal with every provocation to unlawful curiosity and premature ambition, while in his youth he overcame the temptations of the world, and with a faint prophecy of his later mission he waited patiently within his Nazareth home, knowing that his kingdom was not of this world.

There are few places in the Holy Land that furnish so rich a variety and so great an attraction for the artist and photographer as Nazareth. The fine illustrations accompanying this article were specially taken for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and show life in Palestine to-day amid the people of the old Galilean town where Jesus spent his boyhood.

AN OLD-FASHIONED THANKSGIVING

"The merry jangling of sleighbells"

By A. S. FISKE, D.D.

IT warms the cockles of my heart to remember it! We were seven—four boys and three girls—in the sweet circuit of that Father and Mother Love in the old Home. The old House—gone now, alas! But we love—"We"? I only am left of that glad group. Four others had died in infancy, whom I had never seen. The six have followed after, with the venerable Parents, to the Better Land.

Then there was the great circle of Uncles, Aunts and Cousins. To crown all, there were three Grandparents—"Uncle Martin" and "Aunt Lucy," mother's parents, and "Aunt Becky," father's mother. All the "Old Folks" in those days were called, with affectionate and respectful familiarity, "Uncle" or "Aunt."

We used to assemble about the huge fireplace for the festive occasion; then around the long dining-room table, often as many as five-and-twenty keen appetites and kindly, kindred hearts. Ah, the coming! It was an event. Church Service preceded that procession to the home. The family was suffered to go ahead of it, to be ready to receive the guests in due and ancient form. That Service dealt commonly with some topic of public and political concern, and so was a matter of special moment, furnishing a subject for discussion by the competent Senate of the fireside. Before the service there had been a keen contest between the mother and eldest daughter as to which should deny herself the sermon and stay at home to watch the oven, the fires and the laden table, and welcome the returning worshipers. We boys would have denied ourselves more readily and without controversy!

But the coming! Often with the merry jangling of sleigh-bells, always with jolly shouts of greeting. Grandpa, tall and straight as an arrow, alert as a boy till his death at ninety-two, never having had a day's sickness till the third day before his "Passing"; Aunt Lucy, his wife, who died but a day after her husband, at the age of eighty-nine—seventy years from their bridal, neither having known that the other was ill; Aunt Becky, of about the same age, or youth, as they—for she was the merriest, dear old soul, full of quips and jests and stories, bubbling over with laughter and love. Well, we got 'em all if we could—the three generations. Latterly the married boys, of course, began to bring their wives with them and the mated girls their mates. The more the merrier; for, then, Thanksgiving was reunion day of all the New England year.

The old house had been in a busy bustle for days before, or even weeks! The "Back Pantry" shelves were laden with rows of pies, such as only mother and the girls could make. Below them were rows of big, yellow, shining cheeses, and under them on the floor stood generous crocks of butter and tubs of Maple Sugar and jars of cake and cookies, convenient to juvenile hands! It makes your mouth water to think of them all! Down in the bin of the cellar glowed the red-cheeked apples. Out in the barnyard the gobbler had been strutting, proud of the choice of himself as the chief feature of the coming feast, little knowing that the special favors shown him by the boys in the feeding, and the boasting, were but heralds of his tragic but noble fate. The elect pullets were carefully fattened for the heart of the vast Chicken Pie, and were fairly cackling for weeks in the fulness of their unsuspicious joy! So all was on tip-toe of expectant preparedness against the crowning day.

At last the long table was laden to groaning under weight of its china and glass and cutlery displayed on its spread of fine white napery. The guests were merry in greeting and welcome. Halls and chambers were packed with their "things," and the parlors filled with their very selves and their hearty, honest clamor, and all was ready. The Father and Mother led the way to the feast—Father to the head of the table, Mother to the foot, "Aunt" Lucy at his right and his Mother at his left, and "Uncle" Martin at Mother's right, and the rest in their duly appointed order. Grandpa invoked the Divine Blessing. So the feast began, continued and only ended when every course from the opening Turkey down through Chicken Pie and Indian Pudding—brought steaming from the big brick oven in the chimney corner—and the Mince and Pumpkin pies and coffee had been duly honored and the cooks duly praised. Apples, nuts, etc., were reserved for the evening's jollity.

Oh, those were mighty feasts and merry, prepared by no hireling hands, served by the maidenly sisters and cousins, who gracefully rose from their places at the table at the end of each course to execute their merry waitress function, with many a gay challenge and laughing repartee, as the feast went leisurely on. Then the table was cleared and carried off by happy co-operation of all the youngsters, and the games and fun began. Lamps and candles were set well up out of the way, and the roaring and flashing flames from the fireplace illumined all. "Blind Man's Buff," "Button, Button Keeper," "Ring Around the Rosy," and so on, had the call.

"And the games and fun began"

I recall one of these evenings, as some game ended and all were sitting around the great room, Aunt Becky, always full of fun, called out, taunting him, "Uncle Martin! Ah, Martin, I remember what fine figures you used to cut with the girls on the floor. You can't do it now; your joints are too stiff!" Uncle Martin, then far on toward ninety, sprang up, caught her around the waist, swung her out into the middle of the floor, hugely to our amazement and delight. Whereupon my father—a Deacon, too—caught the impulse and laid hold on Grandma Lucy and swung her out, protesting but merrily yielding. My mother pretended to remonstrate, but evidently enjoyed the fun as we all applauded and cried, "Ah, Ha! That's the way you used to do, is it? Why didn't you train us that way?" We got a good deal of light that evening on the social manners and customs of the earlier days of our ancestors and our immediate progenitors!

By and by, with much hearty handshaking, good-bys and kissings and jangling of sleighbells, the guests were sped on their homeward ways and the family left to go over together their joys and sorrows, successes and trials—to bathe their souls in the sweetness of kindred fellowship—in the blessedness of being together again in the old home-nest, close to the Father and Mother hearts. The College boys and the Seminary girls would go over their experiences for the common interest and gladness, and tenderly canvass the on-goings of the Old-Home life.

So, till the flight of the fledglings from the old nest, and the departures of some to the mansions of the blest, used we to rejoice in the Old-Fashioned Thanksgiving Day up there among the New England hills. And I am alone, last of the great group of my Father's house; lonely and homesick, waiting here for that Thanksgiving gathering with the holy circle of the beloved and glorified over on the Other Shore!

The Thanksgiving Dinner on the Old Farm

HEARTS are full Thanksgiving Day,
For from regions far away
Loved ones throng in glad array.

Father, mother, children, all
Love the signs of coming Fall,
For they hear Thanksgiving's call.

Blessed day, when love supreme
Reigns from morn to even-gleam,
And truth follows on each dream!

Closer bind love-ties alway;
Higher mount we when we pray
On each new Thanksgiving Day.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—GIPSY SMITH'S recent Gospel meetings in Chicago were held, not in the Coliseum (as was stated in a recent issue of this paper), but in the Seventh Regiment Armory, which was engaged for that purpose instead, owing to the committee's inability to secure the Coliseum.

—PETER THOMPSON, one of the best known Christian workers in London, and who for nearly thirty years past has been fighting vice and sin in the slums of the great British metropolis, died October 17. He had long been connected with the London East End Mission, and his personal efforts had been made instrumental in bringing hundreds into the light of the Gospel.

—A PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN, continent-wide in its reach, is to be inaugurated by the Home Missions Council, which is composed of the home mission and other boards of practically every Protestant church in America interested in missionary activity in the United States. Immigration, the industrial situation, the race problem, the problems of the city and the country church and other important questions will be discussed. Early in January a series of one-day publicity meetings will be held in fifteen cities.

—MISS SARAH PYLE, founder of the People's Settlement, Wilmington, Del., writes: "Your check received. This money goes toward the Penny-a-Day Society, organized to raise money among their numbers for our building fund. A lady has offered to double all the money which the Penny-a-Day Society can raise, and so by giving toward this fund your contributions are doubled. How we wish we could tell the readers who contributed this fund how much their gift is appreciated! $34,000 has already been raised."

—UNDER THE eloquent pleading of Evangelist Biederwolf, at Sioux City, Ia., lately, a man of about forty walked down the aisle. Grasping the evangelist's hand, he told his story in a few words. "I am the father of three children. I had a beautiful, good wife, who is dead now. Last night I had a dream. I saw her standing, holding the children's hands and sobbing over my sins as if her heart would break. This morning I took my beer bottles and broke them, and broke my whisky flask, and now I've come to give myself to Christ and lead a new life."

—REV. AND MRS. COLLINSON, representatives of the United Christian Workers, have recently discovered, in their house-to-house visiting among the poor in upper New York, a widow of eighty-three years, living alone in a most pitiable condition in a tumble-down room, which is part of a building erected before the Revolutionary War and said to have been used at that time as Washington's headquarters. The poor creature was infirm from lack of care and of food. The place was clean, and Mr. Collinson provided comfortable underclothing and furnishing for the room. They also supplied food for the old lady. Any one interested in her case may address Rev. W. H. Collinson, 728 East 222d Street, New York City.

—TELLING THE STORY of his conversion in The Home Herald, a saloon-keeper says: "Satan's voice rang in my ears, 'Don't be a fool, John; don't throw over the business into which you have put your life. Reform your place, if you will, but don't abandon it. If a bishop conducts a respectable saloon, why can't you?' The argument had weight with me, and I yielded to it. For ten days I tried conscientiously to conduct a respectable, 'Christian' saloon." One day the crisis came. The saloon-keeper knelt in prayer, imploring divine strength and direction, and he rose from his knees and closed his saloon, never to open it again.

The Greatest Reason for Thanksgiving

A THANKSGIVING SERMON BY REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, TOPEKA, KANSAS*

THANKSGIVING is a natural and healthy feeling of a healthy being. There is no condition in life, no situation so severe, no surroundings so bad that reasons cannot be found for real thanksgiving. The expression of thanks to God for the common mercies of life, like light, air, food, health, friends, freedom, children, home, companionship with God, and the assurance of a future life are all genuine causes for Thanksgiving.

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon

But the greatest cause for Thanksgiving is, and should be, the consciousness within one that every year of the Christian era sees more and more people living in conditions which rightfully promote a thankful spirit. It is a cause for the deepest study and the greatest searching of heart on the part of the men and women of the church to consider the actual conditions which exist in different parts of the world to-day. Those who live in favored places in the United States, who have the comforts of Christian homes, and everything that goes with a peaceful civilization, may think that they have many causes for Thanksgiving, but it is a poor kind of Thanksgiving which sits down to a full meal and forgets the hungry; which enjoys education and is careless about the vast multitudes who can never have it; which praises God every morning for a beautiful home, and cares nothing about the thousands of people who never have a home; which rejoices in its own strength and purity, and is blind to the fact that over the great world to-day there is in many places a reign of cruelty, of lust and of vast wrong.

The finest Thanksgiving, therefore, cannot be expressed by any men, or group of men, until the great majority of the inhabitants of the world are in a condition of comfort, of redemption, of development towards God; and while the average American may have many reasons to thank God at the Thanksgiving time, in all his thanks he needs to remember that there are millions of people in the world who can name hardly one of the things that he can as a reason for Thanksgiving in his own impoverished life.

To-day, after two thousand years of the teaching of Christ, the world has still within it those elements which make it hard for any Christian man to thank God for his own blessings without, in the same breath, pledging God that he will do everything within his power to change the conditions which surround other people, and it is not inappropriate at the Thanksgiving time for well-to-do, happy, comfortable people to consider the vast area of conquest necessary for the establishment of God's kingdom, even after two thousand years of teaching and preaching of the Gospel. For example, how can one be truly thankful for a civilization which retains yet the armament and sentiment of war?

Members of churches, influential men in high places socially and financially, rise up in different parts of the country and solemnly declare we must have more battleships. College-bred men, world travelers, statesmen, insist upon it that we must continue to manufacture the weapons of wholesale murder. It is hard to be thankful for what we call a Christian civilization when it contains this old savage, primitive-man element. At least, one cannot be thankful for the blessing of peace, which we actually enjoy, without in the same breath praying that the engines of war may soon be destroyed and turned into useful implements of commerce.

Vast numbers of people are yet held in bondage by hatred of others, or antagonism toward them, on account of a difference in color, or language, or habits. The full thankfulness of the human heart for being made in the image of God must be accompanied in the next breath by a prayer that human beings may soon learn to love one another, remembering they are all of one blood. This is decidedly not the case at present. I hear nearly every week of my life some sentiment of fear, or hatred, or dislike expressed toward some human being of another race, uttered by men and women who are not savages, but actual members of churches, communicants at the Lord's table, lovers of their little children, truth-telling, honest men and women in everyday life. Only a few days ago an educated man, a member of a church, an attendant on prayer meeting, a teacher in the Sunday School, said in my hearing, "I hate these niggers! I do not want to see any of them around. I wish they were all deported to Africa." It is hard to be thankful for the advance of the brotherhood of man—and it has made advance—after hearing a remark like that, for one feels more like offering a prayer that the advance may be made more apparent. We are a long way yet from the brotherhood of the race, and our thanks must be accompanied by great humility because we have done so little to love one another.

Thankfulness for the blessing of civilization receives a check at the thought of the vast sums of money spent on human pride—ten million dollars in the city of New York last Christmas for diamonds alone, to adorn the person. Useless articles of apparel cost millions of dollars to women, and to women in our churches, who grudge the less than one-tenth of one per cent. to carry the Gospel to the heathen! If the unnecessary luxuries of personal adornment could be put into one pile and sold at auction it would pay for every church debt in this country, and give every church a sinking fund of millions of dollars to carry on religious work. It is humiliating to think that after all these years of Christian training the display of wealth on the side of ostentation and needless luxury is the display which denies the ownership on the part of God of the money which is rightfully his.

The song of thanksgiving dies away at the thought of the trade in human flesh. Revelations have come to light in the great cities of the world of actual bartering and buying and selling of that which is the most sacred of all possessions known to womanhood. What Christian man or woman can sing a song of praise very long without adding the heart-searching cry that God may cleanse this nation from impurity and save us, and save us from the woes of Sodom and Gomorrah?

We have made great strides in the direction of temperance reform and legislation. Here is one place where the note of praise may be sounded very high and strong, but in spite of the fact that we have redeemed State after State and passed laws against a traffic in liquor and the custom of gambling, it is yet true that millions of people are slaves to the habits which make brutes out of men, and in the midst of thanksgiving for what God has wrought there needs also to be added the note of steady, persistent effort to go on with this good work until the saloon, and everything that goes with it, is a thing of the past.

According to the witness of many educators in public schools, academies and colleges, for some reason not well known, profanity is on the increase. In one of the public schools of a great city, when a recent canvass was made, it was discovered that more than three-fourths of all the boys swore on the playground, with a large percentage of the girls, many of the children not fifteen years of age, many of them speaking words which they did not understand, having copied them from older people. This is an appalling fact, and while parents may bless God with thanksgiving at the Thanksgiving time for the beautiful gift of children, they need at the same time to offer their prayer on their knees that they may have wisdom and consecration to train these children in the right way. The childhood of civilization is open to temptations which the childhood of barbarism does not know. There are vices in the cities and temptations in the schools which are not common to the free life of the savage. All the more need to guard against the temptations of a highly developed humanity.

After two thousand years of Christ we find many people in the world are still living in the age of the brute. Perhaps it is not necessary to speak of the indifference with which the common crowd views the breaking of limbs, and even the killing of players in athletic contests. Cases are not unknown in the United States where in athletic contests, automobile races, and other forms of so-called sport, the participants and spectators have received severe injuries, and even been killed, while the clamoring audience looked on at the conclusion, and the

A Thanksgiving Home-Coming

By ROSE C. WEBB

"YES, the air's clear as a bell—and there's quite a lot of snow!
'Twill make the best of sleighin' if the wind don't up and blow.
Why, of course they'll like it! We'll send the old big sleigh,
With robes and wraps to keep 'em warm, jest comin' that little way.
Why, city folks don't have sleigh-rides! They'll think it's quite a treat;
'Twill sharpen up their appetites for the turkey they're to eat.

"Yes—twelve-forty! So it's time that they were here.
What! I a-gettin' nervous? Well, what of yourself, my dear?
You're 'fraid John's wife won't love us? Why, she couldn't help it, wife!
She'll love what John loves, bless her heart—God bless her useful life!
To think our boy is a minister—it seems jest like a dream!
Yes, yes—that's them! They're a-comin' now—I see the old bay team!

* * * * * * * * *

"Well—well—well! To think we've got our children home!
The day we've longed for, mother, now at last has really come.
We've longed to see you, daughter; longed to see this little boy,
My namesake; and I'm glad to know hearts seldom break with joy,
Or mine would, sure! But mother here 'll be givin' me down the banks
For sheddin' tears. All ready, wife? My son, will you give thanks?"

"We thank Thee, Father, that we live to see this happy day;
This day of glad Thanksgiving for the blessings all the way.
Through all these years of joy and care Thou 'st given us hope and cheer;
Thou hast in mercy spared us all and brought us safely here;
And, oh—how sweet the welcome home!—a foretaste may it be
Of e'en a happier time, dear Lord, when we come home to Thee."

LAYMEN MEET IN CONFERENCE

A GATHERING, interdenominational in character, with sessions open to laymen of all churches, met November 3 in New York City, in response to a call signed by fifty prominent and active laymen east of Chicago. Mr. Hugh R. Monro, opening the conference as chairman of the executive committee, said:

Hugh R. Monro

"We are convinced that we are in a time of religious crisis; that some new agency must come to the front to support the work of the churches. The laymen must accept the responsibility of taking definite and persistent part in urging the Gospel upon unsaved souls."

The whole tone of the conference was dominated by three deep, strong notes of conviction, to the effect that each and every church member should be an evangelist, consecrated to definite practical service; that there should be a return to the plain preaching of the Bible, and that the great power behind and beneath all effort is ardent, unceasing prayer. Through all rang the refrain of individual evangelistic endeavor; personal work by the individual for the individual.

"There are three kinds of evangelists, preachers, laymen and lay-women," said Dr. David J. Burrell, pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church, where the meetings were held. "It is a great thing to be a preacher, but we are not the only evangels in the church. If there is any one in the church who is not an evangel, he ought to be put out! If you believe the good news that Christ died to save men, you ought to be glad to say so. It is the greatest thing in the world to be able to tell glad news to others. The women are the best evangelists we have in the church; their ministry puts laymen to shame. The hardest problem of the church is how to get men into the business of winning men to Christ."

Marshall A. Hudson

He counseled men to begin evangelistic efforts first at home, in their own families; second, in their business; and third, in the church.

His message gave the keynote to the conference. It was a notable gathering of business men, heads of great concerns, leaders in the industrial, commercial and financial world.

"The greatest business in the world for any one, from the preacher in the biggest church to the smallest boy in the Sunday School, should be the business of saving souls," said Mr. William Phillips Hall.

"If we are not reaching the unchurched men, it is because we are not presenting the Bible, and the Bible only," said Mr. Pearsall, shop-work manager of the Young Men's Christian Association. "Men do want the Bible."

Marshall A. Hudson, a business man of Syracuse, N. Y., and the founder of the Baraca Bible Class Movement, said he believed he had solved the problem of how to reach and hold young men in the church. "Young men at work for young men, all standing by the Bible and the Bible School," is the platform upon which was founded a movement which has grown in nineteen years from a class of eighteen to a circle of classes reaching round the globe, numbering over 400,000 members. It is expected that when the World-Wide Baraca Union meets at Chautauqua, in June of 1910, it will number 1,000,000.

"It is one of the greatest ways to evangelize America," said Mr. Hudson. "We get the Bible into men's hearts. We get young men to working for young men, all standing for the Bible. It has proved a wide-open door to reach men who would not come to church or to the usual Sunday School class. We started with a class of eighteen men, only two of whom were Christians. Four hundred men from that class, as it grew, have joined the church."

Mr. Andrew Stevenson gave a stirring report of the practical work accomplished by the Laymen's Evangelistic Council of Chicago which, during the recent evangelistic campaign, has literally closed the "red light" district in one section of that city, has put saloon-keepers out of business and reached "captains of industry" at their clubs, and bridge-whist players in their homes.

"The laymen of the Central West are more alive to evangelistic work than ever before," said Mr. Stevenson. "The business men's movement in Chicago, started two years ago, now numbers several hundred of the most prominent men of the city. They have worked in tent meetings, shop meetings and churches; they are linking the shops and great industries of the city to the churches."

A letter was read from Mr. Henry P. Crowell, testifying that "laymen of various denominations can work together without jealousy." Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick wrote: "The wisest and sanest way in which evangelistic effort can be conducted is through the recognized means of the Christian Church, the home and education. Individual evangelistic effort must be linked with consistent home life and individual prayer."

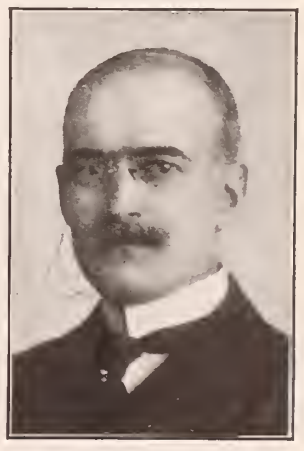
Don O. Shelton

Letters of greeting were read from William A. Peterson, the largest property owner in Chicago, and Thomas S. Smith, one of the leading merchants.

A unique way of conducting evangelistic work among small country communities was described in a lively manner by Mr. William H. Ridgway, of Coatesville, Pa. He set forth the opportunities and results of a campaign supported by laymen, who unite in sending an evangelist throughout a certain Pennsylvania county, "underwriting" him and sending him to churches which in no other way could possibly have the blessing of outside help in revival services. "We have let loose the best evangelist we can find, and we are turning the county upside down."

Dr. C. L. Goodell, of Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, said: "I have never seen, in all my ministry, a time when the people were so hungry for the Gospel as to-day. The Bible is an evangelistic book. With spiritual power in our hearts, backed by a knowledge of the Book, we may share Christ's passion for saving souls."

W. H. Ridgway



The whole series of meetings was characterized by earnestness of spirit and oneness of purpose. Delegates were present from Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Paul, Milwaukee, Pittsburg, Harrisburg, Syracuse, Binghamton, Reading, and many other cities.

The Greatest Reason for Thanksgiving

A Thanksgiving Sermon

principals usually stop only long enough to pick up the dead and wounded and carry them off the field. One needs only to read the accounts in every daily paper of the brutal crimes which are still daily perpetrated in so-called Christian America to realize that the brute in man is by no means tamed. I was present at an athletic contest, a field day game of sports, a short time ago, where several hundred people were sitting around a field, when a rabbit ran out from under a stand of seats. In a second's time more than one hundred boys, grown up men, and even women, were chasing this harmless animal across the field, with the intent of killing it. The murder of birds to get plumage for women's hats is a mark of the most degrading brutality in our civilization.

The women themselves would resent being called brutes, but do not resent, indeed, take great pride, in the fact that they have robbed innocent birds at the time of their mating, or while the young birds are in the nest, of feathers which rob the young birds of their lives and which finally means the extinction of some of the finest and rarest songsters. Forms of brutality are not unknown in the political world. The papers are full of invective and retaliation, not from savages, but from Christian gentlemen, members of churches and esteemed citizens. Vast numbers of people can very easily become mad at one another on account of slights or supposed affronts, not uncontrolled and uneducated savages, but men and women who live in good houses, wear good clothes and go to church.

With the pæans of thanksgiving which we have a right to raise, we ought also at the same time to remember that there is abroad in the land a spirit of antagonism to the very religion which is the source of our greatest thankfulness. There are educated men and women in this land who would like to expurgate and remodel and revamp the Bible from beginning to end, shutting out all the supernatural elements, pruning down the prophetic utterances, knocking out the miracles, reducing Christ to the level of a merely inteliectual man, robbing God of his stern and strong attributes, giving us a milk-and-water Gospel, robbing the world of its hope in the resurrection, trying to account for everything past, present and future by the cold logic of mathematics and abstract philosophy. Sometimes it is hard to be thankful for anything, when one considers the attempts that are made to destroy the faith of men, rub out their sanguine expectation of a better world without giving them anything to take its place.

One of the greatest enemies of the race, and of the United States of America especially, is the indifference of good people to the cause of the kingdom of God. Prosperity makes people careless. Riches, good clothes, food, fine houses to live in, opportunities for travel, what we call "culture," in many cases produce aristocrats, men and women who pride themselves on being in a class by themselves. One does not have to go very far to find, even in the universities of this country, groups of young men and women who are eager to live by themselves, secluded from the great masses, losing their democracy and being proud of it, cultivating a spirit of indifference to the real needs of humanity, the claims of the Gospel and the vast demands of the kingdom of God.

Any minister of the Gospel in this age will tell you that the hardest thing he faces in the course of his ministry is not vice nor crude acts of sin, or outbreaking forms of unrighteousness, but simply indifference and lack of genuine enthusiasm on the part of his church members for the Christ, an absence of love for men, a failure to comprehend in any real degree the meaning of God's love for a lost world. Of all things which sap the energy, and drain the vitality, and drive out the hope from those who are trying to lift up the world, is the indifference of mankind as to whether it is lifted or not.

Let us be thankful by all means. The world will never probably be in a condition where all the evils are all done away with. There will always be something to bring the heart-ache and cause one to cry out to a living God, "How long?" but we have no right to be thankful unless the many are thankful; "that the grace being multiplied through the many may cause the thanksgiving to abound unto the glory of God"; and thanksgiving cannot abound unto the glory of God until the many in the world feel that grace; and we have no right to be thankful at this season of the year unless, as Christian people, we are doing our utmost to make many other people thankful by removing the sins of the world, by bringing in conditions of brotherhood and justice and redemption.

It is not a Christian act to thank God for what we enjoy unless at the same time we realize that the whole world needs to be in the same attitude possible for Thanksgiving. In other words, the great cause of Thanksgiving is the knowledge within us that the world is being redeemed through Christ, with a full redemption for its bodily life, for its mental life, and its spiritual life. Until that condition prevails around the world, and it has been brought to God through a knowledge of Christ, our thanksgiving must be accompanied with a prayer of humility that God will use the church to bring in his kingdom, that he will not let us be at ease, that he will not suffer us to be contented with the good things of life, even with food and clothing, with friends and with home, until we have done the most to purify the world from its evil and make the grace of God abound in the hearts of many.

The Festival of Home

IT is not likely that many people have ever thought of the effect upon our nation of the annual keeping of a Thanksgiving Day. It is but a single day. It is not celebrated in every State. It passes quickly and is apparently soon forgotten, as Christmas and New Year's Day come following fast after it.

But the mere fact that once every year the whole nation is explicitly bidden to look to God in gratitude has an effect far beyond that which is indicated by the superficial announcement of Thanksgiving Day. Deeper than we know, it cuts into the national consciousness and into the national conscience. It has moulded our course and our character as a nation to an extent of which few of us dream.

The pilgrims, though much concerned with affairs of church and State, had little time or use for holidays; but they left us the heritage of Thanksgiving Day, and in that kindly bequest they builded better than they knew.

For the charm which surrounds this day appeals to those who cannot love the austere virtues of its founders. The gathering together of scattered families; the homely simplicity of the traditional Thanksgiving feast; the whole atmosphere of peace and love and cheer which inseparably accompanies the thought of Thanksgiving Day—these appeal irresistibly to the heart of the typical American.

This appeal, though he may not realize it, enfolds within it the appeal also of the finer qualities of the men who first sank on their knees, on that stern and rock-bound coast, at the end of that stormy first quarter of the seventeenth century, and thanked God that he had sent the abundant harvest which had saved their lives, and in saving them had saved the great cause for which they had exiled themselves.

Thus the man who keeps Thanksgiving Day year by year becomes insensibly a little purer; a little more regardful of his Maker; a little more appreciative of the superiority of our national standards (the Puritan standards) over those of any other land that the sun has ever shone upon; a little fuller of the milk of human kindness; and a little better able to exercise the noble virtue of gratitude.

Thus Thanksgiving Day is far more than Thanksgiving Day. It is a subtle leaven which, without the knowledge of many of those whom it benefits, leavens the whole national life and raises it a little nearer heaven.

A Memorable Dedication

IF the founder of the Bowery Mission, now long since passed to his reward, could have returned in spirit to witness the splendid fruition of his "grain of mustard seed," planted with prayer and faith in God thirty years ago, he would have been amazed and gratified at the wonderful development of the Mission's work, as made evident during the recent week of dedicatory services in the new and beautiful home of the Mission at 227 Bowery. The influence of the Mission has literally gone out to the ends of the earth; its converts are found in many lands; its workers are a compact army, and its friends and supporters are legion. Truly, the mustard seed has bourgeoned out until it has become a wide-spreading, mighty Gospel tree!

From the time when THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its proprietor became identified with the Bowery Mission the keynote of the work has been "Christian service." It has endeavored to practically illustrate the elementary principles of Christianity; it has been a refuge and helper for the unfortunate who have made shipwreck of life, and it is a material as well as a spiritual aid to all who come within its friendly influence. Probably the finest eulogium ever pronounced on any rescue work is the simple sentence which has been applied to the Bowery Mission: "The place where crooked men are made straight." At the recent dedicatory services many kind and beautiful things were said of the Mission and its conductors and workers, all of which we accept with cordial appreciation, for we are glad to have the sympathy and good will of those who are foremost in the spiritual activities of the metropolis and the nation.

We ask the prayers and spiritual co-operation of God's people everywhere that the Bowery Mission may go forward to still wider and nobler usefulness in the years to come.

A Continental Movement

OUR country is now in the full tide of a spiritual crusade, continental in scope and world-wide in its far-reaching influence. Seventy-five conventions, arranged by the Laymen's Missionary Movement and including practically all the States, are now under way, the schedule running from October 14, 1909, to March 17, 1910. Eleven of these conventions have already been held, and in point of attendance, deep spiritual power and spontaneous generosity, they have probably never been equaled. Multitudes are responding to the call for a united effort by the forces of Christian America to make Christ and his Gospel known throughout the world. This national uprising of the good men and women of all denominations is one of the most inspiring events of our day and generation. Not only church members and congregations, but thousands who have no especial denominational affiliations, seem to be filled with the desire to see the Great Commission carried out as Christ commanded, and the Gospel universally proclaimed.

It is an advance movement along the whole line. New forces will go to the field, energized and strengthened by the prayers and the loyal support of the workers at home, and the Lord of the harvest will surely add his blessing.

GENERAL NOTES

—THE LATEST SHOCKING illustration of the results of dime-novel reading on the youthful mind comes to us from Kentucky. A seventeen-year-old lad, who had been a confirmed novel reader, seems at last to have gone crazy. Procuring a pistol, he compelled a chauffeur to drive him several miles to a bank, entering which, he killed the cashier and shot down the bank president. Then, startled at his own terrible crimes, he ran back to the motor car, shot the chauffeur mortally, and drove off at lightning speed, until he was overhauled and captured. His mind had probably been filled with thoughts of golden plunder, yet he did not take a dollar of the bank's money.

—JAMAICA, HAITI AND San Domingo were visited during the second week of November by a disastrous combination of earthquake, cyclone and torrential rain causing considerable loss of life and great damage to property. In Jamaica, the loss will exceed $4,000,000. Plantations are in ruins, many railroads and bridges are wrecked and many towns and villages are under water. In one day thirteen inches of rain fell. In San Domingo, the earthquake (which seems to have been general throughout the West Indies) lasted four hours, causing great landslides. In Haiti, the principal cities were devastated, and Port de Paix, Gonaives and Cape Haitien are almost in ruins and many people have perished in the earthquake and flood.

Dr. Klopsch Issues this Appeal

THAT we may do all things quietly, decently and in order, without confusion and without mistake, we publish in this issue—one week earlier than usual—our premium offers for the season of 1909-10.

We do this with a view to inducing our subscribers to renew as early as possible, in order to avoid the rush incident to the great Holiday crush, which is likely to cause delay in filling orders, and hence considerable disappointment.

We are always on the alert to meet the requirements of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family—now about a quarter of a million in number—who, because they are members of our Family, are first entitled to consideration, and hence we are eager to serve them first.

So many demands are made on us during the Holiday Season that unless we can serve our present subscribers a little in advance some may meet with disappointment, which we are very anxious to avoid. Therefore we have timed our outside advertisements not to appear until the members of our CHRISTIAN HERALD Family have an opportunity to state their requirements.

Our readers do not have to be told that I am a very busy man. They know it, and they also know that I have their best interests at heart. Hence they will, I know, fall in promptly with the above suggestion and write me their wants just as quickly as possible. In return I will give their communications my personal attention, giving them precedence over all others; but they must be prompt in order to anticipate the great demand induced by the greatest outside advertising we have ever put out.

I would therefore suggest that as soon as you get this Thanksgiving Issue you write me at once, even if you do not immediately renew, stating which premium you wish us to reserve for you. Do not write a long letter, but simply a postal card, saying, "Reserve such and such a book for me, and send me the 'Dreamland' Calendar now."

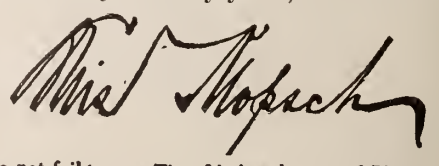
But always remember that, no matter when your subscription may expire, your subscription date is placed one whole year ahead from its present date of expiry; and that means that you do not lose a single number by anticipating your renewal in order to get some premium in time for your Christmas requirements.

It does sometimes so happen that our subscribers wish the Calendar or some of our Premium books just at this time, and there is no good reason why their wishes should not be gratified without disadvantage to them. A renewal is a renewal from the date of your expiry, even if you anticipate months ahead.

All I ask is that you act promptly, and that if you must delay, you will carefully preserve this issue, or the Colored Insert in the middle of the paper. You will need it should you defer your renewal. Let me, in this connection, call your attention to an error on page 4 of our Colored Supplement. The words "Our Art Gallery de Luxe" should read "Our Famous 'Dreamland' Calendar." It is an error of the printer, for which I am not responsible.

Please renew at once—if possible, to-day—and thus help me to serve you more acceptably.

Very cordially yours,



P. S.—Do not fail to note Time Limit at bottom of Picture on First Page of Colored Insert.

Cheyenne's Frontier Day

FRONTIER Day at Cheyenne, Wyo., which has become a national event, was celebrated this season with unusual success. It was the thirteenth annual celebration, and according to custom a number of wild horses were lassoed on the plain and brought to the city, as important actors in the scene. Some of these horses were broken, others were untamable, pawing, rearing, kicking, snorting, zigzagging, leaping, and successfully fighting away all attempts to subdue them. The cowboys at the celebration all wore silk shirts, with gay colors, while the cowgirls dressed in costumes as spectacular. Special train loads filled the grounds with people. The judges were in their place, bands played, and a thousand cowboys and cowgirls, with their gay colors and with their variously acting wild horses, took to the race-course and passed around it twice at breakneck speed, the riders throwing up their hands in triumph and shouting as they passed the judges' stand and the cheering crowd. A band of Indian braves, squaws and pappooses added to the excitement of the scene by their riding and yells. There was then the public breaking-in of wild horses. In doing so they hitched up a wild horse, with one broken to harness, in an old vehicle. A sack was put over the head of the wild horse, and the harness was laid on his body delicately, and the driving began. Some lost their heads, pawed the air, dug up the earth, and snapped and bit, while others astonished the crowd by shivering with fear for a moment and then starting around the track at a pace that kept the tamed horse stretching his limbs to keep up. One of the most fascinating features of the celebration was a relay race by women. They changed saddles twice to fresh mounts, and proceeded again. The horses were drawn by lot, and no woman knew which horse she was to have. One woman rode superbly and led the rest, but she was so slow in getting off one horse, putting the saddle on and mounting another, that Miss Lily Nicholson, of Fort Collins, passed her and was proclaimed the world's champion woman rider. Buffalo Vernon, of Mexico, performed the wonderful feat of riding a horse pursuing a wild steer, jumping from the horse to the neck of the steer while both were running at full speed and throwing the steer to the ground, roping and securely binding him. Then there was the lassoing of a number of wild steers by the cowboys generally. Mrs. Goldy St. Clair, of Oklahoma, received tumultuous applause as she rode the breakneck bucking bronco Gin Fizz, and was accorded the honor of being the champion wild horse rider of the world. The dashing race of the Indian squaws on horseback was counted an interesting feature of the exercises. A brilliant feature of the celebration was the Roman and fancy riding of Troop A, colored, Ninth United States Cavalry, from Fort Russell. Corporal Howard performed one of the greatest feats of the world in driving eight racing horses with perfect ease. The finale in the world's championship bucking contest, which was engaged in by some of the best riders and worst horses the world ever knew, was thrilling beyond description. The Governor, who reviewed the riders, was among the distinguished guests who enjoyed the celebration. The success of Frontier Day was the mastery of these wild and vicious animals by courage, strength, agility and tact; but under ordinary conditions, with ordinary riders, these wild, wicked animals illustrate the truth of the psalmist:

A horse is a vain thing for safety. (Ps. 33 : 17.)

Taft Declines Mint Juleps

President Taft in his tour of the South was greeted with receptions up to the largest measure of Southern hospitality, which cannot be excelled anywhere in the world. He visited and was received by them as the President of the whole country. It is not a new thing for President Taft to turn his wineglass down at banquets. It is pretty generally understood that this is his habit. At the reception at Savannah, Ga., the President was offered three mint juleps, by three most beautiful women. He took one of the glasses in his hand, and gave it back to the woman. She insisted that he take it, saying: "If you drink it you will love the South." "Well," said the President, as he declined to drink the potion, "I love the South any way, so what's the use?" Men of weaker wills might have yielded to this temptation. But President Taft set a better example to the country, and illustrated the moral courage expressed in Daniel's refusal to touch the king's wine.

But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat nor with the wine which he drank. (Dan. 1 : 8.)

Russia's Empress Broken

Court bulletins concerning the health of the Czarina are never published, and Russian newspapers mentioning her illness are heavily fined. Letters from a private source, received in St. Petersburg, indicate that she has had a complete nervous breakdown, threatening seriously to affect her mind. She easily faints while in ordinary conversation, and suffers acute pain at every noise, even the slightest. The court physician has ordered that she take baths in mud brought from the Gulf of Finland. Should her health continue as it is, it is likely that the Czar will not take up his winter residence in St. Petersburg. There is little doubt but that the nervous breakdown of the Empress is traceable to the restlessness of the empire and her anxiety about the safety of her family. Spectres in royal palaces so often shatter delicate nervous systems. The civilized world will join with the good Empress in the prayer of the psalmist:

Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me; for I am desolate and afflicted. The troubles of my heart are enlarged: O bring thou me out of my distresses. (Ps. 25 : 16, 17.)

Deer Shot in Brooklyn

A wild buck deer, weighing some four hundred pounds, with broad, spreading antlers, rushed into the streets of Brooklyn the other morning, pursued by four deer-hounds, that had been chasing it for some fifty miles. Policeman McCarthy was standing on the corner of Wyckoff, near Harmon Avenue, when he heard the baying of hounds, just as the day was breaking, and saw the deer, covered with foam, coming in his direction. He drew his revolver, and, as both the animal and its pursuers had been running all night and were tired, he was able to keep up pretty well in the chase. At Myrtle Avenue the deer dashed into a feed store, knocked over the furniture, backed into one window, breaking it, and, jumping through another, carrying the window sash with it, it continued its course through several avenues. When McCarthy caught up with it he undertook in vain to capture it alive, but was compelled to shoot and kill it, and thus ended the brave race for life. In its flight for refuge and safety the frightened creature made the fatal mistake of running in the wrong direction. The same mistake is made by human souls who, pursued by the hounds of temptation and evil, fly in any other direction than to God, their refuge.

God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. (Ps. 46 : 1.)

Discovery in Photography

Dr. Robert W. Wood, professor of physics at Johns Hopkins University, has made another remarkable discovery by which he was enabled to photograph light waves or colors invisible to the human eye. He exhibited his prints for the first time to the Photographic Club of Baltimore, and explained the manner in which he had secured them. They are landscape photographs, in which certain qualities of the red and violet rays, never before photographed and never seen, produce startling and beautiful effects. The discovery will be of value to astronomy as well as to photography, and Dr. Wood has already taken pictures of the moon by his new method. Professor Wood has made a large contribution to the scientific world in discoveries which he had made before the present one, among them a method of color photography; of the fish-eye lens; of a mercury reflecting telescope, that promises to be of great value in the astronomical field; of a screen which, placed before an ordinary incandescent light, makes the light appear like that of the day, and of a method of intensifying the colors of oil and water-color paintings, and giving them the same relative strength they have in nature. Professor Wood's discovery of colors beyond the sight of the human eye remind us of the beauties and scenes beyond the reach of mortal vision, which no earthly photography has ever caught; which the telescope of sacred truth has not revealed, and whose glories the inspired penman has confessed his inability to describe, as he writes:

Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. (I. Cor. 2 : 9.)

Fights to Save Bible

Trinity Methodist Church, West Brighton, Staten Island, was destroyed by fire the other Sunday afternoon. The fire is thought to have started from an overheated furnace or from defective insulation of electric light wires, and the splendid building, costing about $100,000, was left in ruins. An organ costing $10,000, which had been recently installed, itself water-soaked, was all that was left amidst the wreck. The pastor, Rev. William Palmer, and about a dozen parishioners, in their attempt to check the fire at the start, were compelled to retreat. The pastor made a second entrance into the church for the purpose of rescuing the Bible from the pulpit, risking his life in the attempt, but was driven back by the smoke and flames, without accomplishing his purpose. The Bible was the most precious thing in the world to this faithful pastor's heart, and his impulse to save it from the flames was a tender and beautiful one. The $100,000 church, the $10,000 organ, all the appointments and services derived their chief value from their relation to the Bible on the pulpit. In the fire kindled by the imagination of Hawthorne, the huge Bible was the only thing that was not destroyed; the leather lids and marginal notes perished, but the text was fireproof. The Bible was not destroyed in the church at West Brighton, the ink and paper copy of it was; but the written truth will endure to all generations. The apostle Peter compares the transitoriness of man and earthly affairs with the indestructibility of God's Word when he writes:

All flesh is as grass and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth and the flower thereof falleth away, but the word of the Lord endureth forever. (I. Peter 1 : 24, 25.)

PHOTOGRAPHS THAT SHOW HOW THE EX-PRESIDENT IS SPENDING HIS LONG VACATION

DISPATCHES from Nairobi, East Central Africa, convey to the homeland the gratifying news that Ex-President Roosevelt is well, and that there was not the slightest foundation for the recent rumors of his illness. Mr. Roosevelt and his son, Kermit, have been enjoying a great season of hunting. Our photographs show (1) The porters' tents at Nairobi; (2) A 126-pound leopard which was caught securely in a trap; (3) Mr. Roosevelt and Messrs. Heller and Cunninghame standing beside the skull of a hippo; (4) The Ex-President on his favorite horse, Tranquillity; (5) Kermit photographing (from above) an African porcupine; (6) The porters roasting hippo meat for a meal; (7) Natives cutting up a hippo for meat supplies. The date of Mr. Roosevelt's return has not yet been fixed.

CHAPTER ONE

The Household of Van Vroom

ONE hundred and fifty years ago there was not in New York a more picturesque dwelling than that of Captain Jansen Van Vroom. For, speaking broadly, the Dutch house is as full of character as the Dutch man; it is, in fact, the outward and visible sign of a mentality quite unique and distinctive. No Englishman, no American, no Frenchman or Italian, ever builds his residence after the order of Holland. It would not represent him, it would never be the home of his feelings and his imagination.

But Captain Jansen's house was a solid reflection of the domestic side of his character; he had been building it in his heart and mind twenty years, before he realized it in its material beauty. As he stood by the wheel of his ship, or walked her deck, he was always planning the light, spacious rooms, the lockers and closets, the low, wide stairways, the walls wainscoted with native woods or panels of Dutch tiles. Its gilded weathercock, its red-tiled roof, the picturesque plenty of its gables—with their ends notched like steps toward the street—the blending of bricks of various colors, glazed and laid in checkers on the wall, the window caps of bricks set edgewise, the immense square chimneys, the kindly looking doorway opening in half, and above it, cut in large white stone, the motto he had himself composed:

My Captain has brought me into a good Haven.

These things were slowly, but very clearly, evolved from his mentality, and so plainly set in order before the building began, that any deviation would doubtless have plunged him into a distracted perplexity.

He had chosen for its location a tract of land lying on the North River, and running eastward to Broadway. The house stood nearly in the centre of this tract, and was surrounded by a garden that was for eight or nine months of the year a little drama of color and scent and beauty. Not even Joris Van Heemskirk had such a garden. Some people, who did not like Van Vroom, affected to think Van Heemskirk's house the finer of the two; but there was no possible dispute as to the gardens. Van Vroom's was a little bit of Holland transferred to New York. Every one paused to look at its high box hedges and quaintly cut trees, its graveled walks, its glory of every flowering bulb, its pretty pleasure house and boat house, its "mottoes and verses for a good heart," and its beds of all kinds of herbs for food, and for perfume, and for healing. But however it came to pass, that a sailor man could be such a wonderful gardener, was one of those problems of the Dutch character that no one has yet solved. Jan had spent nearly his whole life at sea, and yet he was always able to send his neighbor Van Heemskirk a dish of peas or berries a full week before Van Heemskirk's were ready to eat; or perhaps a basket of flowering bulbs while Van Heemskirk's were not yet unfolded.

"With my good regards I offer them," were the complimentary words that ever accompanied such gifts, and in that hour of giving he felt friendly to his rival, all comparison being for the time suppressed in his own manifest superiority.

He was sitting quietly one afternoon on the long stoop which faced the river, and watching the birds build in the vines that covered its lattice work. They twittered to him, they hopped from their nests to his shoulder, they rested on his hand or upon his knee, and, when he answered them in a low whistle, they seemed to understand. Many big, fierce men had sailed with Captain Jan, and stood in constant fear of him, but the little birds knew that he loved them, and that they were quite welcome to the shelter of his porch. His large, stolid, sun-browned face, with its black beard, and black brows, and pale blue eyes beneath them, held only kindness for them; and though he was great-handed, and thick-legged, and all his fashion out of measure big, they made him their familiar, and chatted to him about their mates and their housekeeping in the most candid manner imaginable. At least he said so, and it was not well to contradict Captain Jan about anything that took place in his house or his garden.

He looked to be quite at rest, and yet his heart was musing over many things, and not altogether satisfied. That morning he had sent Van Heemskirk a basket of daffodils and fresh garden cress, with the usual message of good will, and Van Heemskirk had not been content to return his customary verbal acknowledgment; he had written a letter, praising Jan's flowers and salad, and regretting a little his own more tardy varieties.

'Come, come! You must take care, Jan,' said Katrina"

Then he had suddenly turned the subject to the closing of the French war, and the glory of the great peace consummated.

"And so on," mused Jan bitterly; "what he will say next, I know. Read it I will not," and he pushed the letter into the lattice work, and shifted his chair a little further away from the offending words.

Now it was not the way of Jan's face to reveal what was passing in Jan's heart, but there was one woman whom neither sign nor the want of sign could deceive. Jan's mind was an open book to his wife Katrina. She came to the house door and glanced at her husband, then placing a chair beside him, she sat down. She did not speak, nor even smile; her knitting was in her hands, and she went calmly on with it. Jan was equally unresponsive. He kept his mouth very stiff, his face was without expression, his eyes fixed upon a linden tree at the river side. There was an apparent vacuum between them. Jan made the first move: he looked at Katrina with a swift side-long glance—for her more vital nature was drawing him like a magnet—then he stirred slightly, sighed, and let his eyes meet the loving eyes waiting for the moment, as he softly murmured one word:

"Katrina."

"My Jan! What troubles thee?"

"No trouble have I."

"Van Heemskirk sent thee a letter."

"Well, then, it was about the flowers and the cress."

"And what else?"

Then Jan laughed. "A little witch art thou, Katrina. It was about the peace. Glad of it is he; and well he knows I am not glad. So, then, his letter was unkind."

"Yes, but thou art glad, Jan. Very glad indeed art thou. Say that to every one. It is also the truth. Think once of the French and Indians butchering their way down to New York. Come! come! The victory was a great victory—the peace is a good peace—and that thou must say."

"It is no good for Jan Van Vroom, and most of our men of standing will say the same thing. No more privateering. Privateering has gone down, Katrina; and what will my ships do now, I wonder? Much money I shall lose. Van Heemskirk knew this well; then I take it unfriendly in him to remind me of the peace."

"Van Heemskirk judges thee by himself. So he measures thee of full stature. He is a good neighbor, Jan."

"Not so, Katrina. Good neighbors I have none; but I give myself no komber because of that. Whose fence touches mine? You know it is the fence of that proud Scot, Alexander Semple. I take leave to say he is nigh intolerable. He talks of the King as if he had more right to talk of the King than I have. If His Majesty is named in the way of conversation, he lifts his beaver; and if to the Presence he could come, it is on his knees he would be, no doubt of that. He is a Scot, and I was christened in the first Garden Street Kirke; yet this Scot is an elder in the kirke, Katrina, and I am not an elder—no, nor even a deacon. I sit in my own pew that my grandfather bought when the kirke was built. I make all my subscriptions, every Sunday I give twice—once to the poor and once to the kirke—also I think of my dues and my charities. I am for the government—if the government will make us some wars, and let my good ships have a little business to do. And if Elder Semple is loyal, his wife is a Stuart woman; a Popery woman."

"Come! Come! You must take care, Jansen, and then pray God Almighty to have care of you, too. Such words are not wise."

"Yes, yes. They are wise and well known. Madame Semple is an enemy

"WATER BABIES" OF THE HIMALAYAS

By ALICE BYRAM CONDICT, M.D.

With a Photograph by the Author

THE "Paharies," or mountain people, of the great Himalayas are a separate class from the peoples of the plains. Like most mountaineers, they are of a free, daring nature. The women have almost as much liberty as those of Europe, although, sad to relate, they are as ignorant as their sisters of the plains. The physique of both men and women is similar to that of the erect, tall and finely-formed Sikhs of the Punjab.

During a recent trip into the Hamalayan Mountains, it was my privilege to closely study these interesting people. It was such a relief to find the women moving freely about, and not wearing the senseless boorkah, or curtain, which hangs from a closely-fitting cap, and which entirely covers the woman. Under this mask, millions of India's enslaved women of the plains are obliged to enshroud themselves whenever they venture to leave their high zenana walls.

Away up in the recesses of the mountains, near Simla, we found the women giving their younger children a daily water treatment, that is most unique. About eleven o'clock in the morning the mother takes her children under ten years of age to a rude hut, into which she has artificially led a tiny stream of water. She places the child's head directly under the cold water of this tiny mountain stream until it is refreshed or goes to sleep. All along the deep mountain gorge we could see many little, rudely thatched huts, into each of which ran a small mountain stream, which was utilized for several children. From earliest infancy this midday siesta is practised, so that the child has no repugnance, no fear. A mother will sit with her rude sewing, or spinning thread for her weaving, while she watches several babies besides her own asleep under the cool mountain streamlet, so that the other mothers may go for the cultivating of their fields, or to do heavy coolie work, or to carry burdens on their heads.

In the photograph which I send you will notice that the little girl (of about three years of age) has on both arms the heavy silver bangles of a married woman, also two nose rings, one suspended from the nasal septum, and a smaller stud fastened in one side of the nose, while the rims of both ears are full of holes that carry many ear-rings. The ground has been prepared for draining the water by digging a narrow ditch, which is filled with loose stones, so that the tiny stream may flow away quietly below, leaving the floor of the hut quite dry. The floor is covered with loose pine needles, or fine, fragrant grass. Over this soft carpet is spread the homespun, gray woolen blanket which the industrious mother's hands have spun from goat's hair or the black sheep's wool of her own flock. A white cotton chuddar (sheet) covers the child. This also is the homespun cotton cloth of the rude loom of the mountain home. A curious object is the tin trough that conveys the water. It is a piece of a kerosene tin, and is plainly marked "Water White Kerosene, Made in New York." All over India one is confronted by American kerosene tins, doing service as water-carriers, or as boxes for food or clothing. Sometimes the tin is cut apart and is covering the roof of a hut, or in grander bungalows it is fancifully painted and figures as a jardinière for plants. Most native servants dignify these tins by the name "the canistra."

As we sit under the thatch of the rude hut and enjoy the cool shade after our vigorous climb over the rocks and sheer precipices whither our quest for mountain "water babies" led us, we could not but admire this native custom that planned so unique a refuge from the hot sun, for even in these altitudes of from 6,000 to 8,000 feet, when the midday sun is not obscured, during May, June, July and August, India is India, even in the mountains. The sound of the softly falling water, so cool and clear, makes one feel that it would be extremely soothing to have it fall on a hot and fevered head.

To our queries the women gave characteristically brief reply. "Oh, it is our custom," or, "This is our caste duty," they said.

Two rather superior looking men came that way, attracted by seeing two "mem sahibs" (white ladies) sitting in their little hut. They enlightened us as to their ideas of the benefits to be derived by the water treatment. One, more loquacious than his fellow, was dressed in mountain shepherd's costume, which consists of a long piece of homespun, loosely woven cotton cloth, draped in folds over his loins. His head was well swathed in the long puggaree (head-covering) wound fold upon fold, in and out, till the head seemed by far the greater member. Leaning on his mountain "stock," with its well-made spike in the point, he was an artistic figure. His intelligent face was lit up by his piercing black eyes as he spoke.

"Yes, ladies of the lords, this has been our custom for many ages. It is only we of these lofty mountains who practise this manner of rearing our children. None of our children suffer from pain. We never have cholera, neither do our babies' eyes run out of their heads from the eye-sickness; neither do our babies have the fevers, or the curse of the skin.

"Then, your honorable presence, you see one mother can easily care for several babies beside her own, for they all sleep most soundly, as long as the sun rides high in the heavens; and so the other mothers can be earning the living of her house, for she has fields to dig and the ground to soften that the potatoes and the corn may grow."

We were curious about the effect of this long midday nap under the cold water upon the nerve centres that lie in the vault of the cranium. Our informant seemed to divine our fears, and no doubt gathered from our questions something of what we surmised might result. "Your presence! Feeder of the poor! we have no children with dead feet, that they cannot stand upon or walk with. We hear that there are such children in the plains, where there are no mountain streams to sleep under; but no such children can be found here."

We could corroborate the man's statements, for we had not seen here any infantile paralysis, which is common on the plains; neither had we seen cases of withered limbs, such as we see many of on the plains. In some of the huts we noticed that a few children were so placed that the stream was made to fall on the base of the skull, near the back of the neck, but never allowed to wet the clothing, or run down the neck. We questioned our informant why this was done.

"Yes, your presence," was the reply. "When the child is somewhat cross, and does not sleep so well at night, or when the teeth are coming, and the mouth is hot and swollen, then we put the water low down, near the neck, and it cools the hot blood and makes the teeth come soon. Yes, long live your presence. We find our children do not get fits, and the foaming of the mouth, when their teeth come, because we make the blood quite cool and its tempers are reduced."

We could only smile and wonder, saying to ourselves, how remarkable it was that these rude people should have found that cooling those nerve centres at the base of the brain would control infantile spasms in time of teething.

These mountain people are very free from eye diseases, so prevalent on the plains; also from infantile paralysis and the resulting atrophy of lower extremities, which are so common among the crowds of every great Indian city. A cripple in an Indian home is looked on as a curse sent from the gods.

It is computed that fully one-third of all little children in India die before reaching the age of seven years. In the average Indian village, or native city, the naked baby or nude toddling child of native parents is allowed to play, to sit, and even sleep in the sun on the heated plains. What a blessing to find one spot, amid these teeming millions, where the delicate child's life is sheltered and cared for in such a unique manner as we saw practised for these "water babies"! May we not learn a valuable lesson from these rude mountaineers as to the benefits to be derived from cooling important nerve centres? How easy to arrange a tiny stream of ordinary cold water, even in private homes, so that from a reservoir fixed a few inches above the crib the child with a large brain and abnormally active intellect may no longer have difficulty in naturally taking a midday sleep, which all young children should invariably have!

These natural and very effective measures may be resorted to elsewhere, with the same good results as among the "water babies" of the Himalaya Mountains.

ABOUT PEOPLE AND MATTERS OF MOMENT

—THREE WOMEN of high social position and mental qualification—Mrs. Post, Mrs. Robbins and Miss Leventritt—have been appointed as members of the New York City Board of Education. This is the first high official recognition accorded to women in the affairs of the metropolis. The new Commissioners will have special oversight of the branches that have the training of girls in domestic science, domestic occupations and the higher education for women.

—AT THIS SEASON of the year, those who have abundant means are planning pleasant surprises for their dear ones, and even the humblest citizen should be looking forward generously to letting in a little happiness into some poorer home than his own, or making some lowly one forget his misery in the presence of the genial spirit of the holiday time. It is a season when many blessed opportunities are open to the liberal soul, each of which, when availed of, brings a blessing both to the giver and the receiver.

—PARAPHRASING A SAYING of Dean Briggs, President Hyde, of Brunswick, Me., writes: "Religion is catching; but you can't vaccinate with it." The example and influence of Christian life and character accomplish the same result. The difficulty with many of our college professors and divinity class teachers is that they try to apply to religion the same rules they would employ in a mathematical proposition—and fail. Faith in God leads a man to step out over and beyond ordinary human experience, and to take hold of that which seems intangible to the scholastic mind, but which is as solid as Gibraltar to the trusting believer. The attempt to teach religion scientifically, as one would teach philosophy, must always result in failure.

—THEODORE RUGGLES TIMBY, who claimed to be the inventor of the Monitor, which fought the Merrimac, and hence the first to give the idea of iron-clad warships to the world, is dead. His claim to be rightly entitled to the fame, which was given to Ericsson, had been laid before the government twenty years before, but was never recognized, although it is admitted that among the Patent Office records is a caveat filed by Mr. Timby, in 1843, for a metallic revolving fort, or turret, to be used on land or on water. There is little doubt that he was the originator of the turret principle, but the world usually gives its tribute of recognition and substantial reward to the man who does things. The original inventors of many of the most important devices now in use have been eclipsed in their own field, undeservedly but inevitably, by capable men who took up their ideas and made things "come to pass."

—THIS IS HOW the South regards "Eliotism," according to Editor George O. Garey, of the Maryland Star: Dr. Eliot "will doubtless write in his First Epistle to the Cosmopolitans: 'Add to your faith (in yourself) knowledge, i. e., the learning to be found in certain accepted books; to knowledge, presumption; to presumption, grasping; and to grasping, assumed love for material beauty. Live for yourself alone, and be willing that others shall do the same. The strongest shall be the fittest, and the fittest shall survive longest. For after death comes the burial, and after burial comes corruption. Dust returns to dust. Immortality is but a myth, save only in the ceaseless round of dust returning to dust through things material.'" The South, Editor Garey thinks, "has no desire to travel over this broad-gauge religious highway. No system of religion can stand that is not founded on the Rock of Ages."

—A WRITER IN the Chicago Interior gives a suggestive sketch of Boston's "multiple religions." In one building called Huntington Chambers no less than sixteen different sects and cults hold forth on Sundays. Spiritualists, Theosophists, New Thoughtists, phrenologists, magnetic healers, and a host of others, are all represented there. There are high priestesses in white robes, who call the audience "Oh, my people" and "dear hearts," card-readers, mind-readers, "sacred" soloists, who sing hymns that are mangled reminders of the sweet old hymns. There are men and women who talk a great deal of rhodomontade and call it philosophy. "Of course," says the Interior's correspondent, "it is essentially non-Christian." The mercenary side continually obtrudes itself at these gatherings.

—ONE OF THE most extensive pension schemes ever put in operation by a private corporation will shortly be put to a practical test by the New York Central Railroad. The sum of $500,000 annually is to be appropriated for pensions for employees who have reached the age of seventy and who have held a position with the road for ten years previous to retirement. Employees under seventy, who have been in the service for twenty years, but who have become unfit for active duty, will also be entitled to a pension. On January 1, 1910, 1,765 employees will be retired and given pensions. The affiliated lines—the Lake Shore and the Michigan Central—will also provide pensions. This is a step in the right direction, and we may expect to see other roads follow the example. As a matter of dollars and cents, or we may say sense, it is a good thing for the company, as it will result in increased efficiency on the part of the employees feeling they have a permanent interest in the road which takes an interest in them.

JOHN-BILL, PAGAN

A THANKSGIVING TALE BY HELEN CHAMPION GREEN

MISS SPENCER stood in her front window and looked anxiously out across the little yard to the road. There had been a heavy fall of snow during the night, and it lay all unbroken before the house. Miss Spencer turned her head this way and that to see if some one might be coming, but there was no one. She had been watching there for the greater part of the last two days, feeling no bodily fatigue under the mental stress through which she was suffering. It was Thanksgiving morning, and Miss Spencer had had no invitation out to dinner.

It was not the loss of the material enjoyment that brought the ache into her sensitive old heart; it was the idea that she had been forgotten. Such a thing had never happened before. In all of the many years of her solitary life, invitations had been plentiful. Now, she told herself, she had grown old and poor and useless—and people had forgotten her.

She held her mouth in a firm, straight line, but now and then some muscle would twitch pitifully, betraying what she was trying to hide even from herself. There was a chair at the window, but she would not take it; she was too troubled and anxious. A sleek, black-and-white cat came silently from his place by the stove and jumped upon the chair beside her. Seeing that she paid no heed, he placed two soft, white paws on the window-sill and tentatively nipped the big geranium plant. Miss Spencer turned and reproved him absently. "Bad John-Bill," she said sternly, "bad cat; mustn't nip the plants." The cat regarded her inquiringly for a moment, then, observing her unwonted preoccupation, continued complacently to nip the plant. John-Bill had been taught that plants must not be nipped, and the savor of the spicy leaf was therefore especially alluring to his palate.

Two boys passed the house, trudging happily through the snow. They were the boys who, a few years before, hearing that Miss Spencer wanted a cat, had brought to her a wriggling round little, black-and-white kitten, and in gratitude for their kindness she named the kitten after them both. Their names were John and Bill. Some neighbors had pointed out to her that John-Bill was not a reasonable name for a cat. They argued that they had never in all their lives heard of a cat named John, nor yet Bill, let alone both. Yet Miss Spencer had persisted; the little boys had seemed so pleased. Miss Spencer liked little boys to be pleased.

To-day, as the boys passed, they gathered handfuls of the soft snow and tossed it toward the window where Miss Spencer was standing. They intended it by way of a friendly greeting, but Miss Spencer was in no mood to take it in that way. She considered it as the final evidence of the unfriendliness, even hostility, of the social world.

"An' I allus did the best I knew, John-Bill," she finally sobbed out; "I did the best I knew."

It was time to be dressing for meeting, but at the idea of definitely giving up hope her heart failed her. On the spare bed was carefully laid out her black silk (that was her dress for occasions), a stiff little bonnet trimmed with shining jet bugles, and two dumpy, carefully blacked little shoes.

Suddenly the kind, long-suffering, old heart steeled itself into rigid rebellion, and Miss Spencer turned almost fiercely toward John-Bill. "I ain't a goin' a single step," she cried out. "You hear me, John-Bill, I ain't a goin' a single step. I ain't got nothing to be thankful fer, and I ain't no call to go to meetin' and give thanks. I'm a poor, forgotten old woman, and I ain't goin' to meetin'. Mebbe I won't never go no more." John-Bill regarded her unwinkingly. A pagan was John-Bill.

"I shouldn't be nothin' but a hypocrite if I did go, John-Bill, settin' up there singin' hymns and readin' psalms and feelin' as I do——" She broke off suddenly, catching sight of the mangled geranium leaf. "John-Bill, you've been a nippin' that plant agin'!"

She moved slowly away from the window, to put away the black silk dress. She limped a little, for she had been standing long at the window, and had become stiff and tired. "When they don't see me to meetin' they'll think I'm dead; died in the night, and mebbe they'll feel kinder sorry," she mused with a glimmer of satisfaction. Then the glimmer died away. "No, they wun't," she continued; "they wun't care a whit, not one on 'em." When the dress had been shaken out and put away, she came back to the window and sank wearily into the chair.

Presently people began to go by, on their way to church. They drove by in high, two-seated wagons, and the light snow flew from beneath the horses' feet as they plowed by. Miss Spencer leaned forward and followed them wistfully with her near-sighted eyes. All those people would sit around big tables, steaming with roast meats, and vegetables, and sauces. Their faces looked ruddy from the crisp air. Some of them would be going out to take dinner with their relatives, and there would be a great clamor of welcome and laughter and taking off of wraps in neat spare rooms, and compliments on new frocks. Others would be expecting guests, waiting anxiously at frost-painted windows, until a team should be spied coming along, way up the road, and there would be a great cry of "There they are," and rush to the door. Miss Spencer knew very well how all that would be, and in the meantime she and John-Bill, the only solitary beings in the world, it seemed, would sit silently down to a little table where there would be spread cold meat and preserves. She had no heart to prepare anything hot; she had half made up her mind not to ask a blessing.

"'Why, Sarah Bassett, what you got there?' she asked, breathlessly"

Presently her thoughts took a more personal turn. "There go the Browns," she observed half to herself—John-Bill had retired to the kitchen after the last allusion to the nipped geranium leaf. "Shouldn't think it 'ud be a very thankful Thanksgivin' fer them, just after losin' their mother. Shouldn't think they'd feel much in the mood fer it." Then after a pause, "Well, that's one thing I've been spared—the mournin' over folks; never had none to mourn over, and I don't know but what it's a good thing."

And a little later: "Conscience sakes! there go the McMillens! House just burned down and they a livin' in the barn until they can manage one way or other to build a new one, and land knows how long it's likely to be. Shouldn't think they'd feel much like givin' thanks; yet there they go, a-laughin' as careless as you please. Well, I'm glad I've got my house over my head. If that was burned down, I guess I'd be about ready to give up.

"An' if that ain't Miss Mellish a walkin' by! Seems if some one might'er give her a lift. She's had a long walk through the snow and she ain't very young, Miss Mellish ain't. Steps along pretty lively, though. Shouldn't think she had any great call for givin' thanks. Lost that little bit of property that hed always kep' her comfortable, and hed to go to work an' earn her livin'. I must say I'm glad I ain't Miss Mellish.

"There goes the Kibbies. Well, I do declare, I should think the Kibbies would'er done better to hev' staid to home; that girl of their'n a gettin' into disgrace and then goin' off and disappearin' the way she done. Seems if twa'n't really in good taste for them Kibbies to be goin' to meetin' and givin' thanks. Don't seem's though I'd ever show my head agin', if I was them, though twa'n't no fault of their'n. I do believe I've been spared a heap of trouble in this world, and mebbe——"

Miss Spencer sat thinking very deeply for some time without looking out. When she glanced up again bright, hot tears stood in her eyes. A wagon, drawn by a stout, white horse, was just plodding by. In it was a pink-cheeked woman who nodded and waved gayly as she caught sight of Miss Spencer's delicate profile in the window. "Well, if that ain't Miss Cummin's, just as smilin' as a lark, and she with that incurable trouble that's like to carry her off at any moment! Don't know but what she's right to be makin' what time she's got left bright and smilin', though." Then, after reflection, "Mebbe I've been overratin' my own troubles. They don't seem to look so big as they did, side of other folks's." And as John-Bill sidled silently into the room again she spoke with a vehemence that startled him.

"John-Bill, we're wicked folks. We're just as wicked as I've ever heard of. Here we're bin shielded from every sort of real trouble, and kept comfortable and well, and here we're so cut up over not goin' out to dinner, that we're a stayin' home from meetin'."

Suddenly she sank forward on her knees, and her slender form was shaking with sobs. "O Lord," she prayed in very anguish, "O Lord, soften this hard heart. To think I've been livin' in grace all my life, and have come out at the last a sinful old woman." She feared some way that her prayer was unheard. She had an idea that the kind Providence was listening to the hymns of praise that at that moment must be welling up from the little white meeting house. Hymns of thanksgiving, sung by people in affliction, whom affliction had made good and wise and sanctified in their simple way.

A half hour later Miss Spencer was seated before her stiff little parlor organ. She could not sing, and furthermore she had fallen into the habit of counting aloud as she laboriously picked out the hymns, but she felt that it would be a comfort to her contrite soul to think she had approached that near to a Thanksgiving service. She was so engaged when a knock sounded at the door. For a moment Miss Spencer sat irresolute. To appear before a caller on Thanksgiving morning in a calico wrapper seemed some way so out of place as to be impious. The knocking, however, continued; some one tried the door, and there appeared before her Mrs. Deacon Lamb.

"My suds!" was Mrs. Lamb's first observation; "My suds, Aunt Lindy! why, I've been so worried about you, I couldn't set no longer in meetin'. When I seen you wasn't there, I ses to Sam, I ses, 'Aunt Lindy ain't here, and like's not she's sick and sufferin', and here we set comfortable in meetin'.' I says to Sam, 'It ain't Christian,' and so I come out as quietly es I could, an' I run every step of the way down here."

Miss Spencer flushed uncomfortably. "I wasn't feelin' jest right this mornin'," she murmured confusedly, "but I guess I'm all right now." Mrs. Lamb looked relieved. "Ain't you comin' home with us to dinner?" she asked. "We're expectin' to take you right along with us. I ses to Sam, every time he drove up into the village, I ses to him, 'Sam Lamb, did you stop and inquire if Aunt Lindy's comin' here fer dinner, or if she's a goin' to the minister's?' And it seems both times he come you was out; but Sam says you'd know we was expecting yer, so it wouldn't make no odds."

Miss Spencer did not look directly at her guest. "I'll be ready soon's I can," she said. Something unusual in her voice made Mrs. Lamb look at her more sharply. "You sure you don't need somethin' fixed up fer yer to take 'fore yer start off? I'd just as leave fix up some herb tea, or something hot to drink." "Thank you," said Miss Spencer humbly; "I don't need nothin'."

"Well, you take care to be well wrapped up; it ain't so awful cold out, but it's crisp like, and driving in the cold air you're apt to feel chilly. You bundle up real good, Aunt Lindy."

Mrs. Lamb hurried down the snowy little path and disappeared from view. And Miss Spencer, with trembling hands, took out once more the black silk dress and put it hastily on. Barely was the preparation finished when there was a startling knock at the door, and the sound of several voices talking excitedly outside. Miss Spencer opened the door reluctantly.

Half a dozen breathless women crowded into the little entry. The spokesman was Mrs. Elias Hood. "Why, Miss Spencer," she exclaimed, "why wasn't you to meetin'? I declare, I got so worked up about it, and so did the rest of us, that we none of us heard a single word of the sermon. And then just when it seemed 's though I should fly, thinkin' about what might 'er happened to you, Willie he leaned and whispered to me; he ses, 'Ma, I jest clean forgot to tell Miss Spencer that you was expectin' her to dinner.' You know what Willie's like since he's took to writin' fer the newspaper; he's so absent-minded that when I had asked him if you was comin' he'd said 'Yes' without once even hearin' what I'd asked him."

Miss Spencer sat very limply in her chair. She thanked Mrs. Hood, and she thanked the others who had felt such concern about her absence. Mrs. Simpson spoke up from the background:

"I'd sorter hoped you'd come and hev dinner with me this year. Aunt Susie Broughton's comin', and I knew you'd been to school together and would have lots to talk over; but Mis' Lamb said you was comin' there, so I knew twa'n't no use askin' you."

Miss Spencer sank farther down into her chair. She glanced at John-Bill, and wondered if he understood. As her visitors started away one of them ruffled up the rug before the front door. Something white showed at the edges. Mrs. Simpson picked it up and handed it to Miss Spencer. "Looks 's though some one hed left you a note," she said, regarding the handwriting curiously. "Looks like Mis' Lovel's writin'." Miss Spencer did not open it until her guests had gone out. Then, with trembling fingers, she drew out the note. It was dated two days before, and, concealed by the rug, had remained unnoticed. It was from the minister's wife, asking her to take Thanksgiving dinner with them. Miss Spencer's thin old face was twisted with many emotions. Contrition came foremost, and a sense of awful guilt, but close beside them stood a kind of elation that she should find herself again in the warm, kind hearts of her people, from which she had imagined herself banished forever.

As she stood in the doorway, waiting for the wagon which was to carry her right into the midst of hospitality and festivity, a woman came hurrying up the path with a basket on her arm. "Why, Sarah Bassett, what you got there?" she asked breathlessly. Sarah smiled all over her broad, homely face. "Mother she said she knew there wa'n't no use askin' you to dinner, 'cause Mis' Lovel she ses es you was comin' there, but she said mebbe you'd like one er her pies. They was especially good this year."

THANKSGIVING FROLICS

HEAR the hickory fire crackle and see the shadows flit up and down the wall. Games that sometimes wellnigh upset the chairs—"Blind Man's Buff," "Who's Got the Button," "The Popping Corn," "The Molasses Pulling," and the witch stories that made the neighbor's boys afraid to go home after dark. Hickory nuts on one dish, roseate apples on the other. The boisterous plays of "More Bags on the Mill," "Leap Frog," "Catcher," around and around the room until some one got hurt, and a kiss was offered to make up the hurt, the kiss more resented than the hurt. High old times! Father and mother got up and went into the next room because they could not stand the racket. They are all gone, and you had better turn the kaleidoscope quickly or you will get us all crying.—T. DeWitt Talmage.

Miss Spencer carried the basket into the kitchen, and took from it a deep, creamy squash pie, all golden brown, with flaky crust. Then there was a plate of doughnuts sprinkled with sugar, and a pint jar of sauce.

"Mother thought you might relish 'em fer supper," suggested Sarah.

"Tell yer mother she's real good to remember me," said Miss Spencer tremulously, and as she watched Sarah Bassett stamping vigorously down the snowy path she called again, "Tell yer mother I appreciate her thinkin' of me; 'twas real kind and good o' her."

As the Lambs' wagon appeared in sight, she looked back once more at John-Bill, sitting bolt upright in a bright spot of sunlight before the door. A neighbor had promised to bring him his dinner when they should have theirs. "I hope, John-Bill," she said tremulously, "I hope it'll be a lesson we shan't never forget." But John-Bill heard her with complacent indifference. A pagan was John-Bill.

Rich and Poor Boys' Chances

WE frequently hear the question asked: Has the son of the rich or the son of the poor man the better chance of a successful career in life? If it were merely a matter of "having" the chances, the question would be quickly answered, since all the obvious advantages lie with the rich man's son. But it is "taking" the chances—grasping the opportunity—that counts, and this is where the poor man's son scores ahead of his rival. "Lads who expect to inherit wealth," writes Dr. Woodrow Wilson, Princeton's president, "are not as easily stimulated to effort and are not as apt to form definite and serious purposes as those who know they must whet their wits for the struggle of life." And this is the reason underlying the fact that almost all of America's greatest sons have been children of poverty.

The President's Thanksgiving Pie

THE pie-bakers of New York, some time ago, decided to make a Thanksgiving mince pie for the President. Then came the strike, which somewhat interrupted matters, but the men were resolved to carry the project through. This particular pie for Mr. Taft's Thanksgiving dinner was to be six feet in diameter. A special commissioner was appointed by the striking pie salesmen to find an oven big enough for the great pie. The average baker's oven door is only four feet wide, and an extra large oven was in demand for the baking of the President's pie. The largest pie ever baked, as far as known, was an oblong pie four feet by seven, but even that would have looked small beside the proposed gigantic White House pie.

THE DAY BEFORE THANKSGIVING

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"IT'S time to set the table, daughter." The mother glanced from the sewing machine, which had not ceased its whirring sound for hours. She was weary and wan, with dark circles under her eyes, and as she paused and folded up her work she looked as if she were what her daughter said, with an accent of tender sympathy, "tired to death." Indeed Mrs. Sprague was tired to the point of exhaustion, yet she intended to spend several evening hours of work before she could drop into her bed and hope for the relief of sleep.

Lillian, the sixteen-year-old girl, had been embroidering a centre-piece, for which she had an order from a wealthy customer who was employing her in the making of Christmas presents. She was not so weary as her mother for two reasons. The first was that she was young and nearer the springtime of life, when one naturally anticipates some pleasant happening in the future, although the present moment may be dark. The second was that Lillian did what little housework there was to do, went to and fro on errands, and had that afternoon taken a walk in the neighboring park. Her mother had not stepped from the door in three days. She was, therefore, more tired than the daughter.

"It's hardly worth while to set the table," Lillian said, as she looked into the closet and inspected the empty shelves. "We seem to have used everything up, mother, except a little tea, some Indian meal and a cupful of molasses. Couldn't I run to the store and get something for supper?"

The mother shook her head. "If I am paid for this work, when it is taken home to-night, we will buy food for to-morrow. If Mrs. Ackerman puts me off with a promise, we shall starve over Thanksgiving. I have made all the haste I could to finish these nightgowns, and if I am paid we will have a feast to-morrow. If not, I don't know what we shall do."

A little voice piped up from the corner. Mother and daughter started, for both had momentarily forgotten the little crippled boy, who was at once their greatest anxiety and their greatest comfort. Hugh was eight years old. He had been run over by a streetcar when he was five, and he could only limp about on crutches. Undoubtedly Hugh was a burden, but he was one of those burdens that love makes light, and often some word that he said uplifted the weary mother as wings upbear the bird. He had fallen asleep in his armchair, and had wakened only to hear his mother's last despairing speech.

"Don't forget, mother dear," he said, "the verse Sister Lillian read this morning: 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing, and one of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father?' Just think! a little sparrow fed by God, and surely we are worth as much as that."

Lillian walked to the chair and kissed the boy. "There is a bit of bread," she said, "and I will toast it for mother and make her a cup of tea. Mush and molasses will do for us, won't it, dear? Don't you think, mother, that I would better carry home your finished work, and perhaps catch Mrs. Ackerman in before she goes somewhere for the evening? You cannot possibly get everything done to-night, and if she will pay you for the garments that are ready that will be the greatest help."

The mother assented to this plan, and Lillian hurried away to the large house on the avenue, only a few blocks distant. There are neighborhoods in New York where the rich and the poor are separated only by the interval of a few streets. Lillian was often the bearer of messages between her mother and her mother's employers, who, as a rule, were women in comfortable homes, dreaming little of the poverty patiently endured by the widowed and the fatherless.

When Lillian reached the Ackerman home with her bundle it was lighted in the early twilight, from basement to roof. A children's party was in progress. She caught, through the open drawing-room doors, as she stood in the hall to which she had been admitted by a trim maid in white cap and apron, a glimpse of fairy-like figures dressed in white with sashes of rose-color and blue, or mingling and intermingling in a childish game until they looked like a moving bed of flowers. A delicious scent of food and a delicious atmosphere of warmth filled the house. A girl was playing on a harp at one end of the long drawing-room, and the silvery notes tinkled like dropping rain or the murmur of a crystal brook as Lillian listened. For an instant she was lost in the wonder of gazing and listening, but the sharp voice of the maid arrested her attention. "Mrs. Ackerman is engaged, and cannot see you to-night. I will give her the package, and tell her you have called."

Something in the maid's tone seemed offensive to Lillian. A sudden sense of injustice, a sudden revolt against the contrast between this home and her own tugged at her heart and almost suffocated her. "I beg your pardon," sh said, "but I must see Mrs. Ackerman."

"I cannot disturb her just now," said the maid.

"Then," replied Lillian, "I will wait." And she calmly seated herself on a chair in the wide and luxurious hall.

The maid frowned and turned away. She knew who Lillian was, but she also knew that her mistress was occupied at this moment with a crowd of little guests, and that she would be annoyed if summoned away. She left Lillian and went downstairs, where she told the cook that the young person who had brought home Miss Cecilia's things was very impertinent and refused to leave when told to do so. The cook, a stout, middle-aged woman, with a rosy face and a mellow Irish brogue, did not sympathize with the maid's discomfiture. "It's ashamed of you, Ellen, I am," she said. "To-morrow will be Thanksgiving, and I wouldn't wonder if that poor woman who is making pretty clothes for our young lady's wedding hasn't a cheese-paring or a cold potato in the house. Mrs. Ackerman is good-hearted and kind, but she doesn't know what the poor suffer when they are living from hand to mouth. Neither does Miss Cecilia."

In the hall above stairs Lillian was saying to herself, in her unspoken thought, almost the same words. "To-morrow would be Thanksgiving, and there was nothing to eat in the house. Every penny had to be saved for the rent, and there must be coal and wood to keep them warm, for neither she nor her mother could sew with frozen fingers. To-morrow would be Thanksgiving, and Hughie, poor child, had talked about the Lord and his care for the birds, even for the little sparrow that was sold for a half farthing!"

As she was thinking, two girls, older by several years than herself, came down the wide staircase arm in arm. One was Miss Cecilia, the other her friend, Caroline Lee. Cecilia looked surprised and vexed when she saw Lillian sitting in the hall, but to her amazement Caroline stepped eagerly forward. "Why, Lilly Sprague," she said. "Surely I am not mistaken, although I have not seen you since you were a wee thing in short frocks. You have not forgotten me, I hope. Don't you remember, you were in the same church with me at Hillslope, and you used to play with my sister Margie when your mother and you and your dear little baby brother were living there, before your father died? We have looked for you everywhere, father, mother and I, and here I find you sitting in the hall, exactly as if God had sent you here."

Tears sprang to Lillian's eyes. "Oh, Miss Caroline," she said, "if only we had stayed in the country! We came to town after father's death, when you were all in Europe, and we've had to stay here because we could never get away."

"Where do you live? Is it far from here?"

"Not a quarter of a mile," answered Lillian.

"Then," replied Caroline, "if Cecilia will excuse me, I will run home with you now and see your dear mother. There will be plenty of time before dinner," she said, turning to her friend, "and I am not the least afraid in these lighted streets. Perhaps you will go with me? Mrs. Sprague nursed my mother once, when mother was very ill, and we have always felt that we owed her a debt that has never been paid. Come, Lillian, show me the way."

"I will go, too," Cecilia replied. First, however, she said a word to her mother, and presently the money to pay for Mrs. Sprague's sewing was quietly slipped into Lillian's hand. Wraps were brought, a maid was summoned to accompany them, for Mrs. Ackerman would not permit her daughter and her daughter's friend to walk New York streets unattended in the winter dusk, and the three girls set out for Lillian's home.

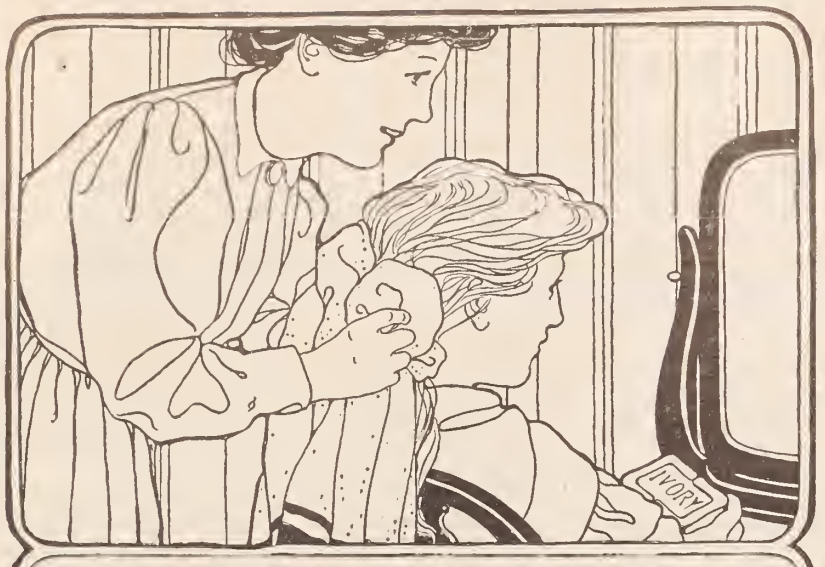
Needless to say, there was a Thanksgiving feast in the tenement home the next day. Caroline was responsible for that. The Spragues had been country neighbors years before. In her desolation, after the loss of her husband, Mrs. Sprague had sought the city, thinking that there she would have opportunity to earn a living. The scanty sum of money she had brought with her had soon melted away, and the accident to her son, with his long confinement in the hospital, had sapped her strength and drained her vitality. She had realized too late that she would have been wiser to remain among old friends, but pride had kept her from writing to them or asking assistance. She had no relatives on whom to call. She and her children were almost alone in the world.

Hughie's faith had not been in vain. When his mother and sister had been at "wits-end corner," an angel had been sent to their rescue, and the name of that angel was Caroline Lee. She had been Cecilia's college chum and was to be her bridesmaid, and she often paid long visits to the Ackerman household, where she was a great favorite.

Late that night Mrs. Ackerman and Cecilia were by themselves, and the latter said, "Mother, dear, I wish you could have seen how bare and poor and clean the house where the Sprague's live looked when Caroline and I went in. They have only two or three rooms, on the ground floor. I feel so mortified to think that I have ever kept Mrs. Sprague waiting for money due to her when Daddy keeps my pocketbook fairly stuffed with bills. I am sure Caroline considers me very thoughtless, but I did not realize what poverty means. Caroline says that the Spragues are people of culture and refinement, that their only misfortune has been that they were desperately poor and had no way to help themselves except by their needles."

Mrs. Ackerman sighed. "I am afraid we have been thoughtless," she acknowledged, "but we'll turn a new leaf over in the future. Tell Caroline this, and, my darling, don't bring a clouded face to our Thanksgiving to-morrow, the last one before Somebody takes his bride away.

"If I am paid for this work, we will buy food for to-morrow"



Yes, Ivory Soap is good for shampooing.

A white soap, it yields a perfectly white lather—a lather that cleanses the hair but does not change its color.

Containing no "free" (uncombined) alkali, it can be used without fear that it will dry the hair or make it brittle.

Use the clearest, cleanest water you can get. Soft water is better than hard. Put the Ivory Soap in the water and when a suds is formed, apply it to the hair—again and again and again. Rinse thoroughly.

Toweling will only partially dry the hair. A fan will help. But the best way of all is to give it an air bath—comb it out and let the air and sunshine dry it.

of King George. Speak but the King's name, and she will echo it with 'Royal Charlie' or the 'Bonnie Prince,' or other words that will be anigh to high treason."

"Well then, Jan. I also dislike Janet Semple. She is a wilful woman, that will have her way, and her way is not a good way. A woman should ask her husband how to talk, eh, Jan?"

"Good! You say what is true. Madame Semple is not particular in her principles, and she cannot keep quiet her busy tongue. Katrina, do you know any woman who can be silent? Give her your right hand, a good friend she will be. Well, then, to make short work of the Semples' neighboring, let me tell you, I like not their son Neil. Have you noticed the silent, haughty youngster? From the kirke he always manages to walk home by the side of our Virginia. I cannot bear that young man."

"Very little I notice him, and Virginia thinks not at all of him. Trouble not thyself on that likelihood."

"There is Bram Van Heemskirk, too; a father must have fears for the young men. A girl like Virginia cannot escape their eyes, and their foolishness."

"Virginia Van Vroom will look higher than Bram Van Heemskirk, or Neil Semple. For a great lady we have brought up our daughter."

"A great lady? Not so, Katrina. I will marry my daughter to a fine Dutch sailor."

"And who, then, is this fine Dutch sailor?"

"It is Batavius De Vries. Since ever Virginia was a little child on my knees, I have been thinking what man she must marry. Now, I have made up my mind."

"A long time it has taken thee."

"Well, then, I am very precise in my way of thinking. I must have testimony to honesty and religion and respectability. That is right, eh, Katrina?"

"Yes, it is right—but——"

"Many years I have been watching Batavius. I am satisfied with the man. I have made up my mind, slowly, yes, but it is now settled; and I do not have to make it over some more. Batavius shall be my son, and my partner, and all will go well with us. Already he has bought one-third of The Crowned Bears, and he has gold in the Amsterdam Bank, and in the London Bank, and much land he owns here in New York. I have thought of these things, for that is my way, and I am satisfied with all I have planned; and it shall come to pass."

"I know not. Virginia has some thoughts of her own about her marriage. She only laughs at Batavius; when she sets him by the side of Joris Artaveldt she will not fail to make some comparisons."

"That is the way of a young girl, silly and scornful, and not knowing the thing good for her. Those two Artaveldts are my uttermost dislike—father and son, I hate them both. I am owing Justice Artaveldt for some words I do not forget."

"Too touchy art thou. Courteous and friendly is Justice Artaveldt to thee, always so. I have noticed that."

"Away with his courtesy and friendliness! I know not the kind he uses. Listen, Katrina! It may be ten days ago, I was leaning on my front gate, but I was not thinking very hard. By and by I see Mr. Justice Artaveldt coming down the street, and something said to me, 'Trot back into the house, Jan; thou art wearing thy worst-sleeved waistcoat, and the silk cap on thy head is frayed and soiled'; and I was turning on my heel when I got better counsel: 'Stay where thou art. At thy own gate, and on thy own land, thou art standing.' So I moved not an inch, and I thought the Justice would touch his beaver and pass on—but, no! He wanted to talk about the press-gang, and he thought as I was a sea man I would say some things."

"But thou did not?"

"To Gustave Artaveldt? No fool am I! I knew nothing, I cared nothing; I said I was thinking of De Lancey, who I heard was sick; and then Artaveldt takes up the De Lanceys, and calls on all men to honor them. Such a noble family! Such great men! So brave! So handsome! 'But that is in the blood, captain,' he went on; 'it takes a thousand years to make a gentleman, and the Artaveldts, bless the Almighty! could hark back much longer than that'; and so he gave me a lot of names—dukes and counts—Flanders men all of them—I think that."

"No, no, Jan! The de Artaveldts come from Lorraine; they are a fine family."

"This, or that, Katrina, I care not; but I was such a fool that I, too, must begin to boast about my ancestors. I said they were none of them men forgotten. I told him how Bernard Van Vroom first took sail through the steaming seas around Borneo, Sumatra, Java, and Japan; how there was a headland in Japan called after him, and also an island in the Javanese Sea. 'And you may see, Mr. Justice,' I said, 'in the Town Hall at Rotterdam, a big map hanging, showing Van Vroom's voyages and discoveries.'"

"And what said he to that, Jan?"

"He said, 'The sea was a great continent, and no one knew what happened, or what did not happen, on it. But that with sword, and lance in hand, the Artaveldts had taken and held the lands on which they had been living for thirty generations. He said the holding of these lands was the law and the testimony of the Artaveldt nobility, and he thought it was a poor man who could not serve himself'—and many words such like."

"Thou should have told him——"

"Wait, Katrina. I did tell him. I said the state maps and the named lands were good titles to the Van Vrooms' services to Holland; and, moreover, I said I thought it was more honorable to serve our modern country than to serve our own hands. And I asked leave to remind him that the Van Vrooms had not forgotten to look a little after their own affairs, seeing that we owned land this day, sold by Governor Stuyvesant to my great-great-grandfather, who was also among the Order of Great Burghers established by Governor Stuyvesant. And the smile on Artaveldt's face was such a smile as I wished to sweep off with one movement of my big hand—but I held my peace."

"A wise thing for thee to do."

"A hard thing for me to do—say that."

"And what answer made the man to thy words?"

"He asked me what a Great Burgher might be—was he a baron, or squire, or lord of the manor? And I answered he was a rich man, Mr. Justice—and my voice was loud and sharp—a very rich man, who could pay for the honor of being among the twenty names that were then the aristocracy of New York. So he asked then, how much they paid? And I told so much as five hundred guilders, but for this they filled all the public offices, and were exempt from attainder and confiscation of goods. So then he asked, what of the

Please Regard This as a Personal Letter

DEAR FRIEND:—No Magazine in the World deals more generously with its subscribers than The Christian Herald. The pages of this attractive Supplement fairly bulge out with an unequaled display of liberality. The profusion of good things which The Christian Herald offers, in the way of Calendars, Premium Books and Magazine Combinations, affords convincing evidence of the large-heartedness and generous impulses of its management.

Other publishers are amazed at what we are doing for our subscribers, and sometimes we ourselves marvel at our ability to do and to give as much as we have done and have given for 20 years past.

However, liberality pays. The Christian Herald has grown from a circulation of 31,000 in 1890 to nearly 250,000 in 1909; and, best of all, it keeps on growing! Its prestige the wide world over has attained proportions unapproached by any other publication, and its influence for good has become a potent factor in our national life.

Through the unprecedented generosity of its readers, without regard to color, creed or nationality, The Christian Herald has established for our country the proud distinction of being the Almoner to Nations in Distress; and, even in a greater degree than intelligent statesmanship, it has aided in the development of fraternal relations between our own and other lands.

India, Russia, Japan, China, Cuba, Sweden, Mexico, and Italy hail our country as their most generous benefactor in times of famine, plague, flood and earthquake, because of the grand and glorious work carried on by the readers of The Christian Herald. When we realize all that our subscribers have done to make such a remarkable record possible, we feel that nothing but our very best should be done for them in return; and it is, no doubt, the splendid example they have set that constrains us to respond in kind.

May long life be the portion of The Christian Herald Family, and blessing upon blessing on every member of it and on every member of each member's family!

We wish that our great Family Circle could always remain complete, with not one familiar face missing, and we invite all to continue with us during the coming year, to share in every good work and in the joy that results from it. If, however, for any reason, this cannot be, send us your address, and we will occasionally mail you a complimentary copy. We want to keep in friendly touch with you.

And now, in closing, permit me to refer you to Num. 6: 24, 25, 26 as my Holiday Greeting, and as a Benediction for the coming year, from

How we Discovered the Picture which Illustrates Our Exceptionally Attractive Calendar for 1910. Our 1910 "Dreamland" Calendar is a PHOTOGRAVURE (not simply black and white), and Measures 18x21 inches

WHILE in Europe last May on his way to an audience with His Majesty Victor Emmanuel III., King of Italy, Dr. Louis Klopsch, Editor of The Christian Herald, discovered a picture entitled "Dreamland," practically unknown in America, but greatly admired in European art circles. It was painted by Prof. F. Charderon, the famous French artist, and at once attracted the attention of art connoisseurs.

The beauty of this veritable masterpiece so impressed Dr. Klopsch that he immediately decided to arrange, if possible, for its reproduction in this country. This, after months of delay, was finally accomplished.

The large and superb Photogravure reproduction, all ready for framing, which embellishes our Calendar, is more than excellent. While the subject itself is one of rare beauty, its striking attractiveness is greatly enhanced by the soft richness, velvet texture and mellow tint, which find charming expression in this Splendid Achievement of the Engraver's Art.

The above Miniature reproduction in black and white cannot give more than a vague idea of the beautiful picture which adorns our 1910 Calendar. This Calendar measures 18x21 inches, and wherever displayed will at once attract the eye of every Art Lover, and all who have any appreciation for genuine beauty.

Our Beautiful 1910 Dreamland Calendar

Goes free to each and every Subscriber, whether With or Without Premiums or Magazine Combinations. Money refunded if not delighted.

Kate Upson Clark

writes as follows: "Among the thousands of beautiful pictures which have appeared in recent years we believe that all will agree that this sleeping child is the most artistic and the most charming. The crude harshness of line which mars so many works of this kind is utterly absent from this superb photogravure. The softness and delicacy of the reproduction are entirely worthy of the beauty of the subject, and must appeal at once to the cultivated eye.

"Scarcely once in a lifetime can so fair and flower-like a figure be obtained. Purity and peace breathe from the face of the sleeping child. Every one who looks upon it feels a sense of calm and repose.

Mrs. Sangster

Says of Our Dreamland Calendar: "There is not a Mother, or, for that matter, a Grandmother, in this wide land, from coast to coast, who will not want the 'Dreamland' Calendar for her own, as soon as she sees it. The artist has chosen an ecstatic moment in home life, when the household darling, weary with play, has been caught in the toils of slumber. Here she lies, every muscle relaxed, the dimpled hands and the dancing feet quiet in repose. It is all one can do to keep from dropping a kiss on the rosy cheek. But we must not do that, for we might waken the baby and call her back from Dreamland. The Christian Herald has offered its readers many beautiful Calendars, but this one surpasses all former productions."

Our DREAMLAND CALENDAR will be sent FREE to every new and renewal subscriber. Undamaged and Uncreased Delivery Guaranteed.

A Feature of the Dreamland Calendar is the Legibility of the Dates, which are Large and Clear

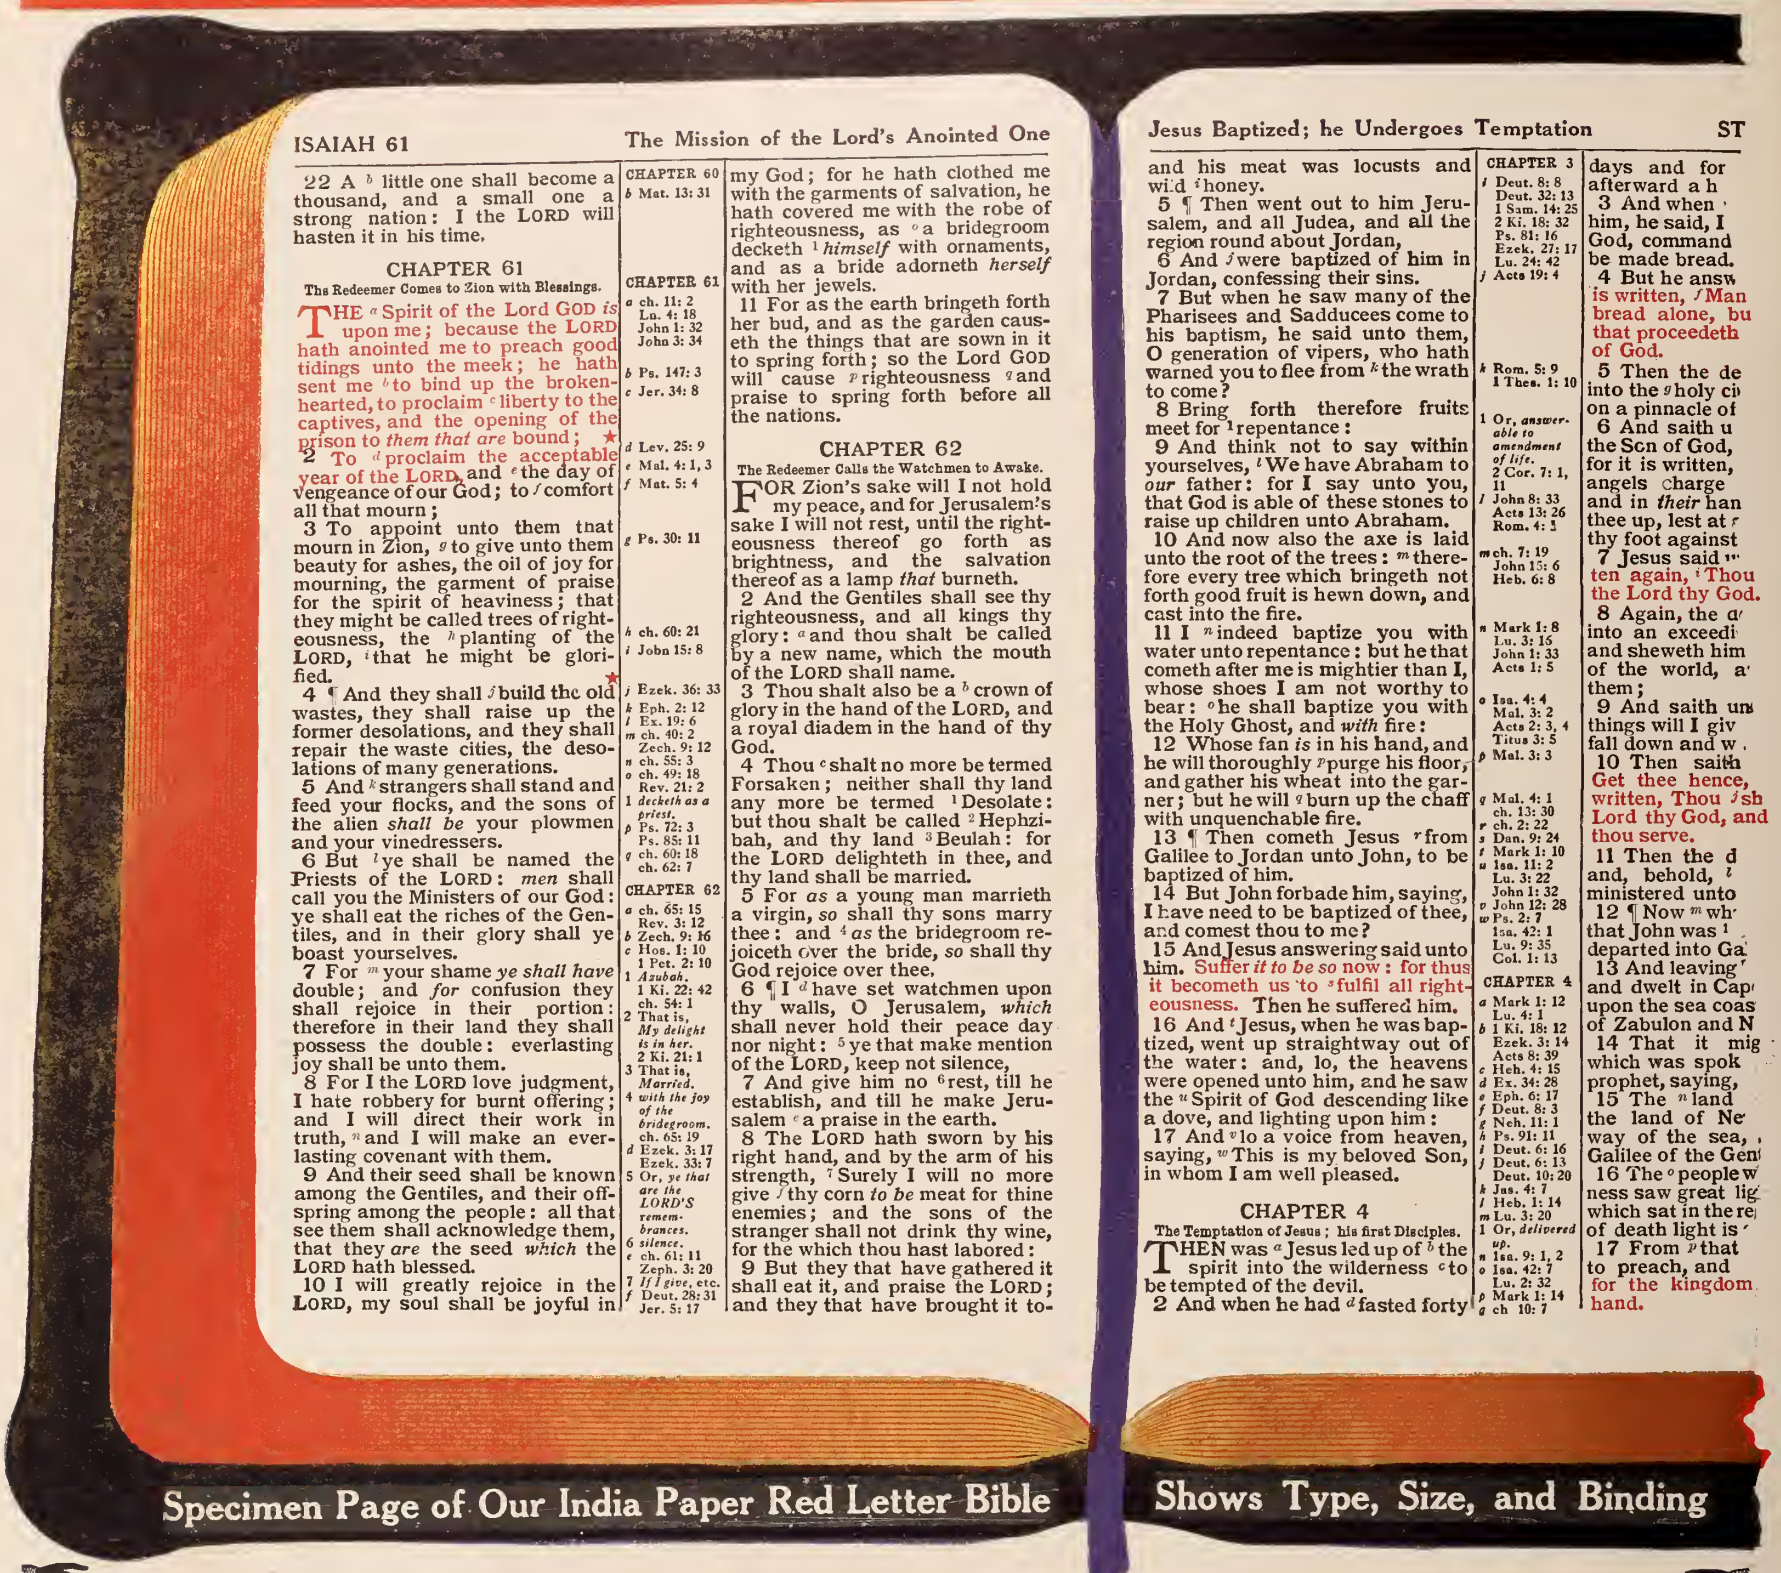
Millions of Dollars for World-Wide Charities

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is internationally known as the "Almoner to Nations in Distress." It has distributed in Home and Foreign Relief Operations during the past fifteen years the enormous sum of Four Million Dollars. Emperors, Kings and Queens have received its representatives to express their thanks for the generous assistance afforded in staying the ravages of famine and pestilence. The American Government has repeatedly placed warships and chartered vessels at its disposal for the transportation of relief supplies.

In our own country the beneficences of The Christian Herald are without number. Its Bowery Mission supports the world-famed Bread Line, at which a hot breakfast is given to 2,500 homeless men and boys every night, and at its "Children's Paradise" it has entertained for a ten days' outing over 33,000 children of the tenements, receiving 3,000 children annually. More could be said but more is not needed.

Only India Paper Red Letter Bible in the World



22 A [b] little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.

THE [a] Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me [b] to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★

2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn;

3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified. ★

4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [n] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as [o] a bridegroom decketh [1] himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause [p] righteousness [q] and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzi-bah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

6 ¶ I [d] have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: [5] ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,

7 And give him no [6] rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem [e] a praise in the earth.

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, [7] Surely I will no more give [f] thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:

9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it together shall drink it in the courts of my holiness.

10 Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people.

11 Behold, the LORD hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh; behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him.

12 And they shall call them, The holy people, The redeemed of the LORD: and thou shalt be called, Sought out, A city not forsaken.

CHAPTER 63

The Lord Treads the Winepress Alone.

WHO is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, travelling in the greatness of his strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save.

2 Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the winefat?

3 I have trodden the winepress alone; and of the people there was none with me: for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment.

4 For the day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemed is come.

5 And I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold: therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me; and my fury, it upheld me.

6 And I will tread down the people in mine anger, and make them drunk in my fury, and I will bring down their strength to the earth.

7 I will mention the lovingkindnesses of the LORD, and the praises of the LORD, according to all that the LORD hath bestowed on us, and the great goodness toward the house of Israel, which he hath bestowed on them according to his mercies, and according to the multitude of his lovingkindnesses.

8 For he said, Surely they are my people, children that will not lie: so he was their Saviour.

9 In all their affliction he was afflicted, and the angel of his presence saved them: in his love and in his pity he redeemed them; and he bare them, and carried them all the days of old.

10 But they rebelled, and vexed his holy Spirit: therefore he was turned to be their enemy, and he fought against them.

11 Then he remembered the days of old, Moses, and his people, saying, Where is he that brought them up out of the sea with the shepherd of his flock? where is he that put his holy Spirit within him?

12 That led them by the right hand of Moses with his glorious arm, dividing the water before them, to make himself an everlasting name?

13 That led them through the deep, as a horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble?

14 As a beast goeth down into the valley, the Spirit of the LORD caused him to rest: so didst thou lead thy people, to make thyself a glorious name.

15 Look down from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory: where is thy zeal and thy strength, the sounding of thy bowels and of thy mercies toward me? are they restrained?

16 Doubtless thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not: thou, O LORD, art our father, our redeemer; thy name is from everlasting.

17 O LORD, why hast thou made us to err from thy ways, and hardened our heart from thy fear? Return for thy servants' sake, the tribes of thine inheritance.

18 The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little: our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary.

19 We are thine: thou never barest rule over them; they were not called by thy name.

CHAPTER 64

The Prophet Prays for Mercy.

OH that thou wouldest rend the heavens, that thou wouldest come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence,

2 As when the melting fire burneth, the fire causeth the waters to boil, to make thy name known to thine adversaries, that the nations may tremble at thy presence!

3 When thou didst terrible things which we looked not for, thou camest down, the mountains flowed down at thy presence.

4 For since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him.

5 Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness, those that remember thee in thy ways: behold, thou art wroth; for we have sinned: in those is continuance, and we shall be saved.

6 But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away.

7 And there is none that calleth upon thy name, that stirreth up himself to take hold of thee: for thou hast hid thy face from us, and hast consumed us, because of our iniquities.

8 But now, O LORD, thou art our father; we are the clay, and thou our potter; and we all are the work of thy hand.

9 Be not wroth very sore, O LORD, neither remember iniquity for ever: behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people.

10 Thy holy cities are a wilderness, Zion is a wilderness, Jerusalem a desolation.

11 Our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee, is burned up with fire: and all our pleasant things are laid waste.

12 Wilt thou refrain thyself for these things, O LORD? wilt thou hold thy peace, and afflict us very sore?

CHAPTER 65

The Lord Will Save His Elect.

I AM sought of them that asked not for me; I am found of them that sought me not: I said, Behold me, behold me, unto a nation that was not called by my name.

2 I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people, which walketh in a way that was not good, after their own thoughts;

3 A people that provoketh me to anger continually to my face; that sacrificeth in gardens, and burneth incense upon altars of brick;

4 Which remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments, which eat swine's flesh, and broth of abominable things is in their vessels;

5 Which say, Stand by thyself, come not near to me; for I am holier than thou. These are a smoke in my nose, a fire that burneth all the day.

6 Behold, it is written before me: I will not keep silence, but will recompense, even recompense into their bosom,

7 Your iniquities, and the iniquities of your fathers together, saith the LORD, which have burned incense upon the mountains, and blasphemed me upon the hills: therefore will I measure their former work into their bosom.

8 Thus saith the LORD, As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it: so will I do for my servants' sakes, that I may not destroy them all.

9 And I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob, and out of Judah an inheritor of my mountains: and mine elect shall inherit it, and my servants shall dwell there.

10 And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks, and the valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down in, for my people that have sought me.

11 But ye are they that forsake the LORD, that forget my holy mountain, that prepare a table for that troop, and that furnish the drink offering unto that number.

12 Therefore will I number you to the sword, and ye shall all bow down to the slaughter: because when I called, ye did not answer; when I spake, ye did not hear; but did evil before mine eyes, and did choose that wherein I delighted not.

13 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD, Behold, my servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry: behold, my servants shall drink, but ye shall be thirsty: behold, my servants shall rejoice, but ye shall be ashamed:

14 Behold, my servants shall sing for joy of heart, but ye shall cry for sorrow of heart, and shall howl for vexation of spirit.

15 And ye shall leave your name for a curse unto my chosen: for the Lord GOD shall slay thee, and call his servants by another name:

16 That he who blesseth himself in the earth shall bless himself in the God of truth; and he that sweareth in the earth shall swear by the God of truth; because the former troubles are forgotten, and because they are hid from mine eyes.

17 For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind.

18 But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy.

19 And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying.

20 There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed.

21 And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them.

22 They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat: for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands.

23 They shall not labor in vain, nor bring forth for trouble; for they are the seed of the blessed of the LORD, and their offspring with them.

24 And it shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear.

25 The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock: and dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, saith the LORD.

CHAPTER 66

The Lord Will Judge All Flesh.

THUS saith the LORD, The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool: where is the house that ye build unto me? and where is the place of my rest?

2 For all those things hath mine hand made, and all those things have been, saith the LORD: but to this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word.

3 He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol. Yea, they have chosen their own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abominations.

4 I also will choose their delusions, and will bring their fears upon them; because when I called, none did answer; when I spake, they did not hear: but they did evil before mine eyes, and chose that in which I delighted not.

5 Hear the word of the LORD, ye that tremble at his word; Your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for my name's sake, said, Let the LORD be glorified: but he shall appear to your joy, and they shall be ashamed.

6 A voice of noise from the city, a voice from the temple, a voice of the LORD that rendereth recompense to his enemies.

7 Before she travailed, she brought forth; before her pain came, she was delivered of a man child.

8 Who hath heard such a thing? who hath seen such things? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? or shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children.

9 Shall I bring to the birth, and not cause to bring forth? saith the LORD: shall I cause to bring forth, and shut the womb? saith thy God.

10 Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her, all ye that love her: rejoice for joy with her, all ye that mourn for her:

11 That ye may suck, and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations; that ye may milk out, and be delighted with the abundance of her glory.

12 For thus saith the LORD, Behold, I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream: then shall ye suck, ye shall be borne upon her sides, and be dandled upon her knees.

13 As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you; and ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem.

14 And when ye see this, your heart shall rejoice, and your bones shall flourish like an herb: and the hand of the LORD shall be known toward his servants, and his indignation toward his enemies.

15 For, behold, the LORD will come with fire, and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire.

16 For by fire and by his sword will the LORD plead with all flesh: and the slain of the LORD shall be many.

17 They that sanctify themselves, and purify themselves in the gardens behind one tree in the midst, eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse, shall be consumed together, saith the LORD.

18 For I know their works and their thoughts: it shall come, that I will gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come, and see my glory.

19 And I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, to Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, to Tubal, and Javan, to the isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles.

20 And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the LORD out of all nations upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the LORD, as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel into the house of the LORD.

21 And I will also take of them for priests and for Levites, saith the LORD.

22 For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the LORD, so shall your seed and your name remain.

23 And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the LORD.

24 And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me: for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.

Specimen Page of Our India Paper Red Letter Bible — Shows Type, Size, and Binding

The Speed at Which this Circular is Run may Throw Out the Alignment of the Red Lettering. It is NOT SO with the Bible Itself.

Our Red Letter Bibles and Testaments

Our Red Letter Bible — ONLY GENUINE EDITION

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible contains the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

1. In the Old Testament, the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.
2. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of our Saviour are Printed in Red.
3. A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

Our Red Letter Bible, illustrated above, Contains Full References; also a Concordance, Subject Index, and Dictionary — all under One Alphabetical Arrangement — together with Helps, Maps, and Numerous Illustrations.

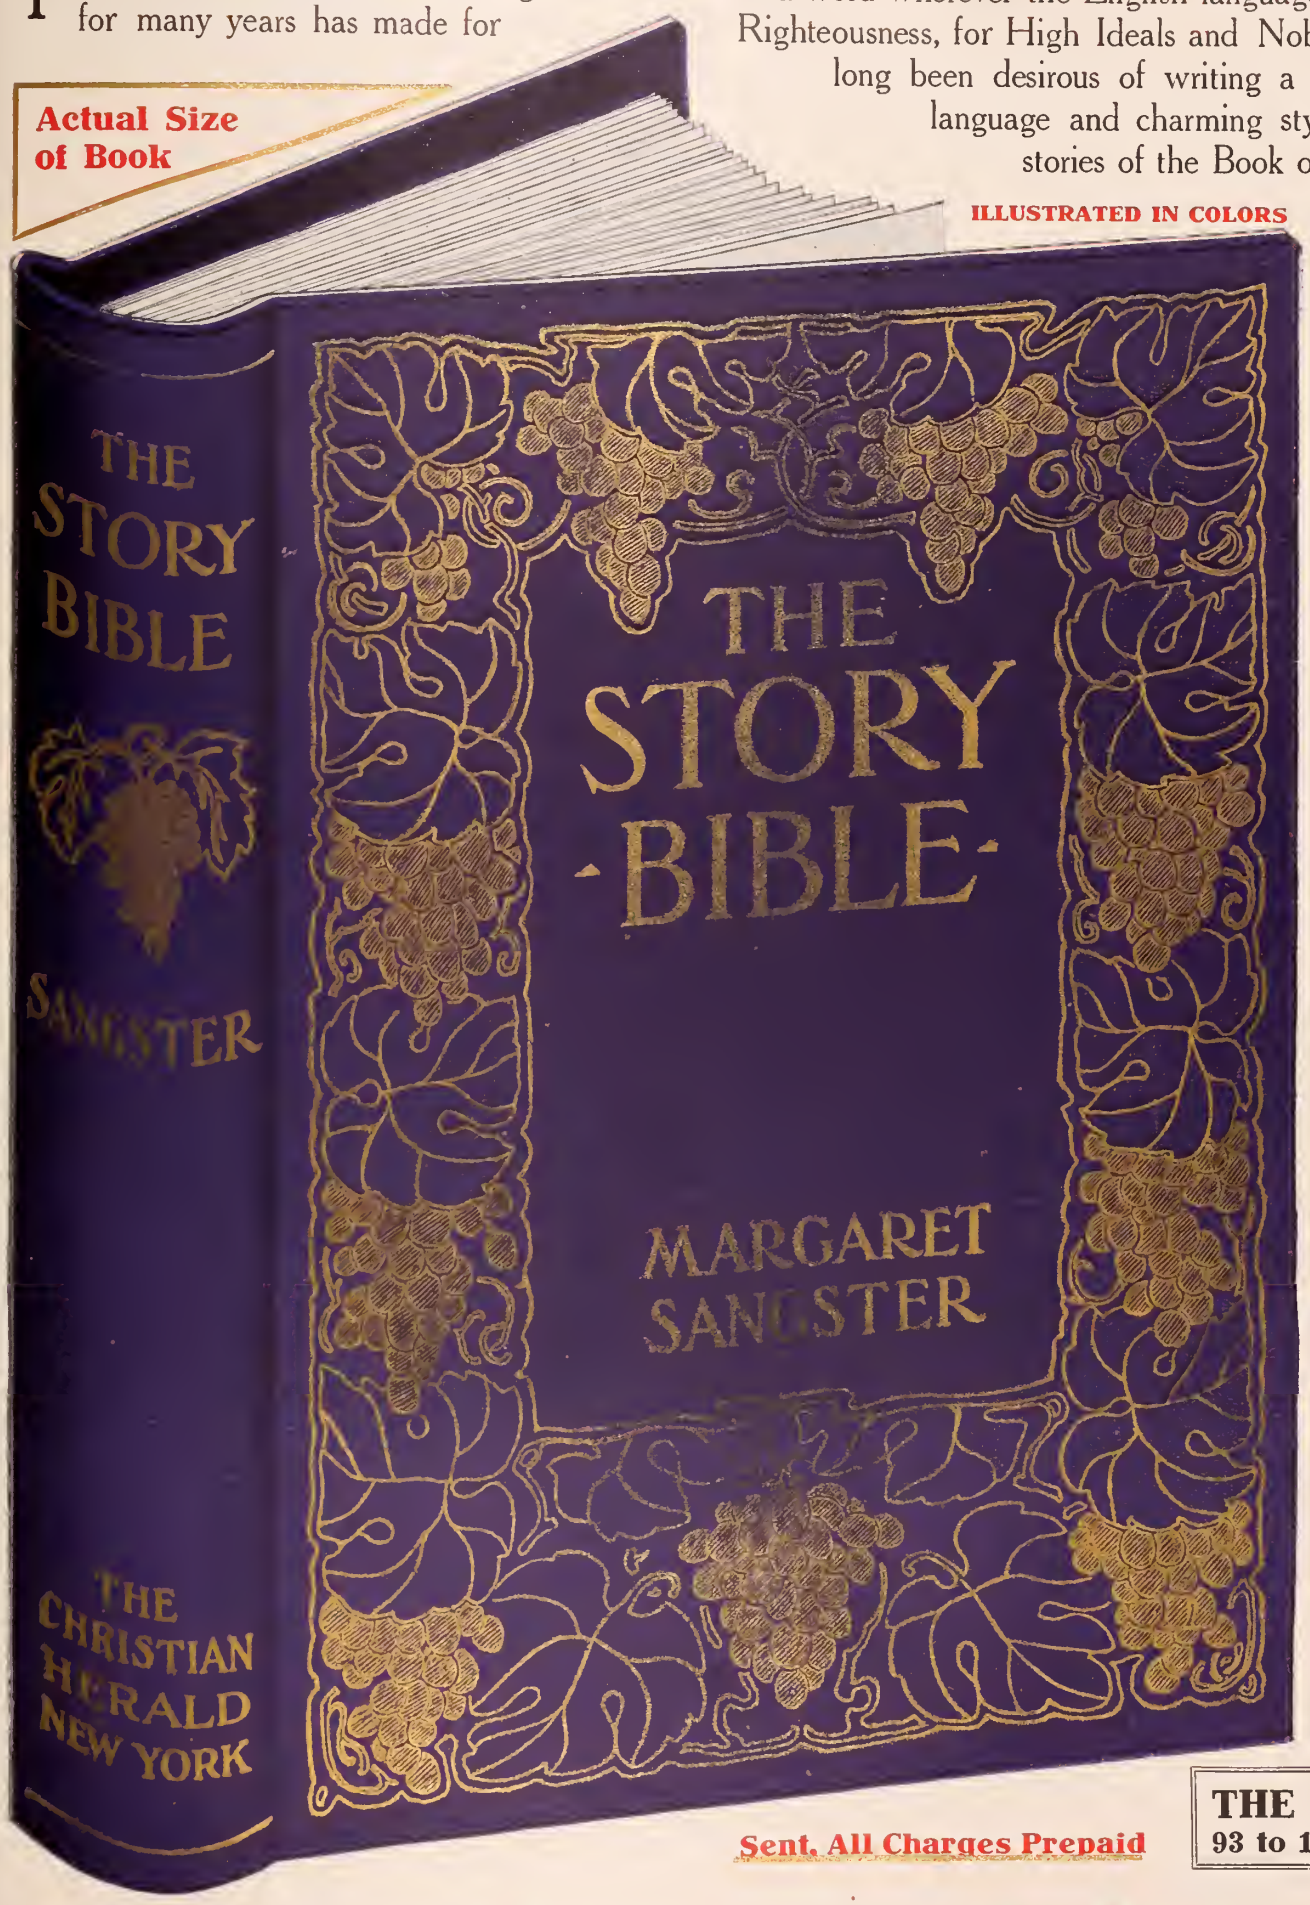
Tender, Dramatic and Full of Charm

THE name of Margaret E. Sangster is a household word wherever the English language is spoken. Her literary work for many years has made for Righteousness, for High Ideals and Noble Living. Mrs. Sangster had long been desirous of writing a Story Bible which, in plain language and charming style, would re-tell the matchless stories of the Book of books, and after much preparation she set about to do it.

Actual Size of Book

ILLUSTRATED IN COLORS



These Stories Are Immortal

Beginning with the Garden of Eden and going through the Old Testament all the way to the New, through the Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, and to the Book of Revelation, she has accomplished her task in a way simple, tender and dramatic. While writing this book, she had constantly in mind the family circles at home—the fathers, the mothers, and especially the little maids and little men who are to be the men and the women of the future. Every line is consecrated by love and hallowed by prayer.

Here are the wonderful life-histories of Abraham, Moses, David and Daniel; the stories of our Lord and His Disciples. They are so attractively written that they will be read over and over again.

A Royal Gift
"BEYOND PRICE"

EVERY FAMILY Should Own a Copy of THE STORY BIBLE. The color-illustrations are singularly beautiful and the type a delight to the eye. No More Acceptable Gift is this season offered to the Christian Homes of America. ADDRESS TO-DAY

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
93 to 112 Bible House, New York

Read TO-DAY Carefully the First Page of this Circular

THE reason we place particular emphasis on the word To-day is that we fear the Great Special Offer to all who renew or subscribe on or before December 31 may escape your attention. We want to make the year 1909 the Banner Year of The Christian Herald's illustrious history, and hold out this exceptional inducement with a view to securing as many subscribers as possible before it closes. We dare not tell you what the picture is worth, lest you subscribe for the picture instead of for the paper; but when you get it you will exclaim with tens of thousands of others, "How can they do it?" This photogravure is the Greatest Christmas or New Year's Gift ever offered by any magazine, and goes, in addition to the "Dreamland" Calendar, FREE with every subscription mailed on or before December 31, 1909. Money cheerfully refunded if not pleased, and you need not return the picture. Surely this is very fair—is it not?

Money-Saving Combinations

American Boy

Biggest, brightest and best magazine for boys in all the world. You need never worry about your boy's company when he is chumming with The American Boy. It is the greatest adjunct to refined home training. Wins every boy's confidence and enthusiasm. Bright, breezy stories of adventure, travel, history, biography and world events, beautifully illustrated. Proper amount of sports and games, and practical departments of photography, electricity, stamps, curios, carpentry, mechanics, how to do things, how to make things. Is doing more for the healthy entertainment and uplift of boys than any other single influence. Has the enthusiastic support of over 250,000 boys, and their parents. Give your boy a magazine of his own.

American Magazine

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is fortunate to be able to secure The American Magazine this year on the same special terms as in previous years, because its price has been raised to 15 cents a copy, and $1.50 a year.

This increase is necessary because of the addition of forty more pages of reading matter and pictures, making the magazine bigger, better, brighter, livelier, more joyous than ever. The three most important features appearing in any magazine this year are in The American Magazine: "What Woman Has Done in America," by Ida M. Tarbell, a historical series lavishly illustrated. "Simon, the Jester," a fascinating novel by William J. Locke, author of "Simple Septimus." "Barbarous Mexico," a startling series on slavery and other amazing conditions in Mexico, by J. K. Turner. Many other extraordinary features will appear in The American Magazine for 1910.

Cosmopolitan

Cosmopolitan Magazine is the one great magazine of all the great national monthlies. No matter how many magazines you take, Cosmopolitan is the one you cannot afford to do without. Its subscribers of last year are subscribers this year—with their friends. This, after all, is the real test of a magazine's merit—that its readers tell their friends about it. You can be sure that in 1910 one feature in each issue will be of such universal interest as to dominate the magazine world for that month. As single instances, take Cosmopolitan's great series of brilliant short stories by George Randolph Chester, or the intensely interesting adventure story by E. Phillips Oppenheim. "The best, no matter what it costs" is the motto which makes Cosmopolitan resemble no other magazine but Cosmopolitan.

Good Housekeeping

Good Housekeeping Magazine is a richly illustrated monthly, the one magazine which has popularized household science and home-making in a broad sense. It is the most practical of the household magazines, and at the same time one of the brightest and most refreshing of periodicals for general reading, its fiction and discussions of current issues being particularly good. It is an all-around family magazine, which renders home-making a pleasure. How to secure the most and the best for the money in home furnishing and equipment, and in food supply, is among its specialties. Its greatly enlarged Household Experiment Station, Model Kitchen and Testing Room of household appliances is a national institution. Special attention is given to health, to children, to needlework, and stenciling.

Harper's Bazar

Beginning with the Christmas number of 1909, Harper's Bazar goes into its superb new, enlarged and improved form. It will be bigger than ever before. It will be better than ever before. It will be more interesting than ever before. It will be more helpful than ever before. It will be indispensable to every thoughtful woman whose ambition is to make the most of life for herself and for her family. It will "set the fashion." It will continue to be the supreme authority on questions of good form, household decoration, entertainment and domestic topics of every kind. It will have the best short stories, the best pictures, the best essays, the best poems found in any woman's magazine.

NOTE—The descriptive matter on this page concerning the above magazines is supplied by their respective publishers for the information of our readers.

Magazine Clubs

For Home Reading or for Holiday Gifts

Search wherever you may, you will never find anything that, at the price, gives greater and more genuine satisfaction as a gift than a weekly or monthly magazine, which the whole year through reminds the recipient of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

Little Folks

A beautifully illustrated monthly magazine for children from three to thirteen. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunshiny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and, above all, true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also playwork for little fingers.

McClure's Magazine

Mr. S. S. McClure, editor of McClure's Magazine, is one of the greatest magazine editors in America and a man of national reputation. Speaking of McClure's Magazine, he said recently: "I shall continue to spend more and more money—to give my readers a better and better magazine. McClure's Magazine for the next year will be more intensely interesting, and will exert a more potent influence on American life than any other magazine. It will he the best twelve numbers of any magazine in America." McClure's is always a step in advance of other magazines. Besides the articles on government, politics, people and things, McClure's is also famous for its fiction. The coming numbers will make new history for McClure's. You'll want them surely.

Pearson's Magazine

One-half is for information on subjects in which you are interested; that means home subjects, the things that American people are thinking and talking about. Once in a while some foreign matter may be discussed, but only in its relation to Americans and only when it means something to America. During the coming year informative articles on subjects which mean something to the average man will be written, in every case by the writer best qualified for the matter. The other half of the magazine is for entertainment, purely and simply. Pearson's Magazine is famous in two hemispheres for its fiction. It gets the best that is written. There is a continual and urgent demand from the newspapers for Pearson's stories. Do you want this sort of a magazine?

Review of Reviews

Fifty Magazines Condensed—More Necessary Than Ever.

In a single number of The Review of Reviews there are sixty topics, every one of real, immediate interest to every intelligent man and woman, discussed and interpreted by Dr. Albert Shaw, his staff, and his contributors; there are one hundred pictures that really illustrate and inform, including the cartoon department, which amuses into the bargain; there are fifty magazines and leading articles skilfully condensed, and scores of the new books reviewed. "The Review of Reviews is a liberal education," is the way one eminent subscriber sums it up. The more things that happen—the more magazines there are—the more indispensable is The Review of Reviews. Busy men and women want it, need it, read it. Why not you?

Woman's Home Companion

The greater Woman's Home Companion will be the most interesting, the most useful and the most beautiful woman's magazine published. There will be fiction by Anna Katherine Green, Juliet Wilbur Tompkins, Anne Warner, Myra Kelly, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and a host of others. There will be special articles no woman will want to miss. With nearly a score of different practical departments for women Woman's Home Companion can promise the most useful woman's magazine in the world. In short, The Companion will have more stories than the fiction magazines, more pictures than the picture magazines, and more practical departments than any other magazine.

World Evangel

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are Sunday School teachers or scholars should not fail to include The World Evangel in their combination magazine orders. The Evangel is the leading Sunday School magazine. It makes teaching delightful and effective, its fund of anecdotes enabling the teacher to interest scholars of all grades. Its lesson study department provides the best available exposition and information, and its lesson-teaching department is divided into Adult, Intermediate and Primary Departments, including comment on Primary Graded Lessons. The Superintendent's Department is most practical. In addition to the lesson comment, by six specialists, it presents the most successful methods and news. The Evangel will save time and increase your efficiency.

World To-day (The)

The one magazine indispensable to every home. A world review, furnishing monthly not only a complete digest of events, but many attractive articles on timely subjects, by noted contributors. In it you will find events, religion, travel, science, invention, art, drama, literature, education, etc., treated in a popular way, affording recreation for the idle hour, and, best of all, something worth while. In illustration it is a regular panorama of the world—many of the pictures being in colors. The World To-Day is really a $3 magazine for but $1.50. It is clean, healthful and inspiring—just right for Christian readers. Its remarkable quality and low price make it an exceptional bargain. It has proven one of our most popular publications, and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

Tells Just What to Do

"Before the Doctor Comes" enables any one to know quickly the most efficacious remedy to apply in case of sudden illness or accident while waiting for the Doctor to arrive. With this Ready Reference Book in the house you may rest assured that you are prepared to do all that is possible to do for your loved ones.

Compact and Comprehensive

An exhaustive Index enables you to instantly turn to the very page that will tell you in a few simple words "What to do and how to do it" until the arrival of a physician.

Written in the fall of 1909 by two practising physicians, every line is right up to date and every recommendation is based on the very latest results of modern experience.

For many years to come this unusually helpful book will be recognized as a Standard Compendium of Emergency Advice.

This book has the hearty Endorsement of Notable Medical Men, who realize the necessity for quick and intelligent action in certain emergencies.

What Would You Do While Waiting for the Physician to Arrive?

Were your child bitten by a mad dog?

Were a member of your family to fall and fracture a limb or dislocate an elbow or a shoulder?

Were baby to develop diphtheria in the night?

Were some one in the family to take virulent poison by mistake?

Were you to get a cinder imbedded in the eye?

Were the baby to develop the croup and have bad choking spells?

Were a fishbone to get caught in your throat?

Were an artery accidentally cut, with danger of bleeding to death?

Were you to detect symptoms of either scarlet fever or the measles in your child while traveling?

Were one of your family to be badly burned or scalded with boiling water?

Were your child to sprain an ankle while out walking with you?

Were a visitor at your home to suddenly faint?

Were your child to swallow a coin?

Were you called upon to revive someone nearly drowned?

Were your child to fall on its head and be rendered unconscious?

Were a spider to poison one of your family?

Were you to be seized with an uncontrollable fit of sneezing or hiccoughs?

Without "BEFORE THE DOCTOR COMES" you MAY do the proper thing; but with this splendid work to guide you, you KNOW that you are doing the best that can be done. Include this "Good Samaritan" when you order.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

rest? and I told him they were called Small Burghers, and paid fifty guilders and had the freedom of trade only. He said most extraordinary! He wondered that he had never heard of the Order, but he thought he must pay his five hundred; for in these days of treason it would be worth while to be exempt from attainder and confiscation of goods."

"Well then?"

"I said, it is past. It only lasted eleven years, for then came Lord Lovelace and the English, and Lovelace made all citizens equal. Then Artaveldt thumped his stick on my brick sidewalk and cried out—'Very proper indeed! I am against an aristocracy of wealth! It is the most vulgar and offensive of all distinctions! It is a pernicious difference! abominably pernicious!' And so lifting his beaver, and touching his brow with the gold knob on his stick, he walked off as pompous as if from all the French kings and counts he was descended; and just then I had no words ready for him."

"Very good was that. Silence is the unbearable answer. Keep thy anger secret, Jan. After all, what was it but a few words? They were nothing. His son Joris is a man that all praise. He is Virginia's friend since these many years. With him she first went on the ice, her lessons he helped her to learn, to dance he taught her, he——"

"To the heart of my dislike thou art coming. I think Joris Artaveldt is in love with Virginia, and that foolishness he will be teaching to her next."

"Dost thou think all the young men in New York are in love with Virginia?"

"All of them that have any light in their eyes are in love with her. See then, for that very cause I have chosen her a husband to make her happy and give her no adventures. It is adventures that make women wrong and unhappy."

"Art thou thinking of Batavius De Vries? She will never marry that man. I have told thee. Cast that thought out of thy mind."

"That I will not. For seven years it has been the first and the last thought. About it I have now no doubts, not one. That is the end of the matter. I am right."

"Just now it is the end, for I hear the boat scraping the shingle. That will be Rose and Virginia returning."

"Where have they been?"

"On the river with Joris Artaveldt."

"What did I tell thee? See now!"

"Well, then, I think Joris may be in love with Rose. His father would like it so."

"I, too, would like it so. It would be a great satisfaction to me, and for once Justice Artaveldt and Jansen Van Vroom would be of the same mind. And, Katrina, if this friend of Virginia's be Lady Rose Harley, then in my house let her be called Lady Rose. I do not object to titles, not at all. Whoever is good and noble may say so. Disguising the matter is improper."

"Lady Rose is handsome enough and proud enough to be a queen, but she loves Virginia like a dear sister. So soon as she saw her, she loved her."

"She could not help that—no one could. I have on my Flemish ruffles and long waistcoat, so then I will stay here and make welcome to my house this English lady—that will be proper, and she will expect it."

Madame did not answer. She went into the house and her husband followed her. Together they stood at a window watching the two girls slowly stepping up the flight of low stone stairs leading from the beach to the first grassy lawn. They were hand in hand; they were singing and laughing at the song which they were evidently only learning, for they corrected themselves, and went over a strain, and then ceased suddenly, and stood watching the apparently troublesome task of fastening the boat.

Jan's eyes lengthened and widened with delight, and his face was transfigured with love as he watched them. Presently young Artaveldt came bounding up the steps and, passing gently between the girls, took a hand of each. Then the Captain moved restlessly.

"Katrina," he said, "what a great thing it is to be young! Yes, indeed, what a great thing it is to be crazy!"

Katrina slipped her hand into his—"We, too, Jan! We are crazy yet! Would thou be wiser?"

"To be a fool with thee, I am content. Look once at Virginia. Is she not the fairest creature God ever made?"

"She is thy only daughter, but thou must not forget thy dear son."

"My boy can fight for his will, and his right, but my sweet Virginia must be cared for every moment. The darling can not say this or that for herself."

"A great mistake that is. Cross thy Virginia's will just once, and thou wilt have thy big hands full. Look at the Lady Rose; is she not very lovely?"

"She is like a gipsy. For such a dark woman I care not. She is nothing to Virginia but a great difference—yet I have known some men who thought much of dark women. I understand not such men. She will match young Artaveldt very well. May a good Fate send a gold ring between them."

Madame nodded her head, and kept her eyes on the two girls and the young man approaching. The glory of the setting sun was behind them, the young spring flowers at their feet, the young green leaves above their head, and all the winds of Love and Hope blowing softly through their lives. They were yet in a world that expected every good thing from everybody. So they came into the presence of the Captain and his wife with a confident joyfulness, and the Captain rose to the occasion. He gave Lady Rose a welcome full of honor and kindness, and she rewarded him with a bewildering glance from her large brown eyes, and spread out her skirts in such a coquettishly alluring courtesy that there leaped from some long forgotten corner of the Captain's memory a bow of grace and admiration to answer it. He was astonished and pleased with his own aptitude, and he took an instant liking to the beautiful girl who had caused him to behave with so much gallantry and fashion.

They had trooped together into the large houseplace; they were windblown, and sun-flecked, and hungry; and Virginia asked anxiously about the tea hour. Then Madame came delightedly to the front of emergencies. Her face—strong, sympathetic, and sensible—beamed upon the inquirer; her words were full of hospitable kindness. She called servants to lay the damask cloth, and then, assisted by Rose and Virginia, she set in order the china and crystal and silver necessary. In a short time the large table held one of those simply luxurious meals called "high teas"; and, oh, the innocent mirth of the girls, the ringing laughter of Artaveldt, the loving care of Madame, the delightful dictation of the Captain! Such repasts are not all material; a spirit informs them; they are a kind of household sacrament, and cannot be classed with mere physical feeding of flesh and blood.

On the Grace of Giving

By Mrs. M. Baxter

"WHAT is your rule about giving?" is a question often asked among Christians. The replies are various, but they are always in accordance with the measure in which God is appreciated by the speaker. Many fall back upon the old Jewish law, and say, with a kind of self-conscious righteousness, "I always give the tenth." Others, who do not make much stir about it, reverse this order, live on the tenth of their income, and give nine-tenths to God. We know of one who always does so. "But how can such a man keep up his position?" some may say.

When our position is to be at God's disposal as regards all we are, and all we have, the keeping of our position is in his hands, not ours; it does not consist in having a house furnished to our taste, in having a number of servants, horses, carriages, and the society which such surroundings always bring—but, on the contrary, in being free from all which cannot serve God's purpose.

Under the law, the tenth of everything was God's portion, and a pious Jew would have counted himself guilty of sacrilege to appropriate this portion to his own use. In the early days of the church, some few thousands of believers "were of one heart and of one soul; neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed [let alone the tithes] was his own." Then great grace was upon them all; then half-hearted men dared not join themselves unto them; then a lie could not live for half an hour; then all the sick were healed, and conversions took place in multitudes. What, then, would be the effect if the millions of believers now living in this land were to do the same? What would be the result if once again the Spirit were abroad among us to leave all and follow Jesus? Thank God, there are blessed instances of this Spirit among us, but the majority of believers do not give to the work of the Lord much more, if as much, as respectable unconverted people do.

The apostle Paul speaks to us of the "grace," not the "law," of giving. He has laid down a law of God in this matter: "He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully." God has one rule in our days, not of law, but of grace. He does not bind us to a tenth, or a fifth, or one-half, but says, "Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give, not grudgingly, or of necessity, for God loveth a cheerful giver." What, then, is the purpose of our hearts? "All for me and a fraction the Lord's, to satisfy my own conscience!" Is this the purpose of heart? "I must have my comfort, I must make the same appearance as my friends, or what would they think of me? I must keep my carriage; it is expected of men. I must have receptions; and then, how can I give more? My income barely suffices."

Who insists on all this? Is it God or "the prince of this world"? "Oh, everybody does the same." And is your purpose of heart to honor the claim of everybody but God? And are you, poor slave of everybody's opinion, a child of God? Does not such a bondage come from his enemy? Oh, be free: honor God's claim. He "is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work . . . being enriched in everything to all simplicity [see margin], which causeth through us thanksgiving to God." Simplicity, or singleness of eye, makes everything easy.

What About The Turkey?

By JOSEPH McDONALD

THE world is very happy, for Thanksgiving Day is near,
Trouble vanishes from sight, and life is full of cheer.
The homestead rings with laughter: the cousins all have come,
The pantry groans with pumpkin pies, and mince, with many a plum;
But in our joyous feasting, do we ever stop to say:
"How do the poor old turkeys feel about Thanksgiving Day?"

How fluffy and how innocent the infant turkey looked,
Last spring before he ever knew that such as he were cooked!
And as we tossed him corn and mush, with free and lavish hand,
Alas, poor little turkey! he did not understand
That it was all on our account we let him live so high,
And that for our Thanksgiving Day he fattened—but to die!

Our wise forefathers so ordained, and we are not to blame
Because they chose the season's bird and bade us choose the same.
There is no morsel quite so choice, admits the epicure,
As fine young turkey-meat in Fall: of that we all are sure;
And we are glad to have it, but we really must say
We feel sorry for the turkey that we eat
THANKSGIVING DAY.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Life Lessons from First John*

THIS beautiful and poetic letter is one of the few New Testament Epistles of which the authenticity has never been questioned. Its ideas and its whole spirit are so essentially similar to those of John's Gospel that the dullest can see in both the hand of the same inspired artificer.

The prevailing motive of the epistle is that of love—love to God, love to man—the love which works untiringly for its object, which keeps the commandments of the loved One, and, loving him, loves all that he loves, for his sake.

None of our modern sects, though some of them count their ideals greatly superior to those of what they call the "old-fashioned Christianity," has conceived or can conceive a higher creed than this. The human mind cannot grasp anything higher.

Those to whom John wrote were evidently in danger, in his judgment, of being led away by false gods. The temptations of those days were like our own, and the admonitions of John to his people apply just as well to us. To them, as to us, came the lust of the eyes and the pride of life; Antichrists abounded; deniers of Jesus and his Gospel were on every side. But we are told, in sweet comfort, that if we confess our sins God is faithful and just to forgive them, and that we have an advocate with the Father, who is himself a propitiation for them.

The great peace movement of our century might well choose as the motto for its flag the fourth chapter of this wonderful epistle. He who loveth God loveth his brother also, and in this love all fear is cast out.

In one of Dr. Jefferson's pointed comments upon the present prevalent doctrine that we must keep ourselves heavily armed in order to promote national peace he says, "If nations are not armed, they are certain to fight; but, if properly equipped with deadly weapons, they think only of peace. Nations are never so friendly as when they sit down in the midst of explosives and look at one another through the bore of a gun. The editor of a military journal recently published an article in which he represents the military strength of the nations by figures of men, a huge giant representing Russia standing at one end of the line, and a little pigmy, representing the United States, standing at the other. It is evidently the regret of this editor that the United States cannot be more like Russia. Militarism, in the attractive garb of the angel of peace, is making advances which no patriot can witness without alarm. It is an arduous undertaking to break down the ideals of a nation, and the United States must be 'educated' to appreciate the beauty and worth of guns as safeguards of the peace."

This is an eloquent plea for that same love for and trust in his fellowmen that John, in his fourth chapter, urges upon every Christian, telling us that the man who says "I love God," yet hateth his brother, is a liar.

The Ten Commandments held none of this spirit of self-sacrificing love. They stood for justice and righteousness, but no more. John enjoins far more. We "ought to lay down our lives for the brethren"; and if our brother have need, we cannot, if the love of God dwelleth in us, shut up our bowels of compa sion from him. The "new commandment" of Jesus is added by John, in chapter after chapter of this epistle, to the immemorial moral law, upon which the constitutions of great States have been built.

The Ruin of Idleness*

IN one of the most delightful of our modern books, Carl Hilty's collection of essays entitled Happiness, he con. nds that the chief obstacle in the way of civilization has always been man's hatred of work. His plea that every one should work, as hard and steadily as he can, is very eloquent.

Hilty emphasizes one point, which is also mentioned prominently by Dr. MacAdam. Busying one's self about trifles is not work. True work concerns itself with the production of that which is valuable for mankind.

You may say that you do not know what to do. Two correspondents of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in widely separated States, have recently written to this office to ask what they should do. They did not have to earn

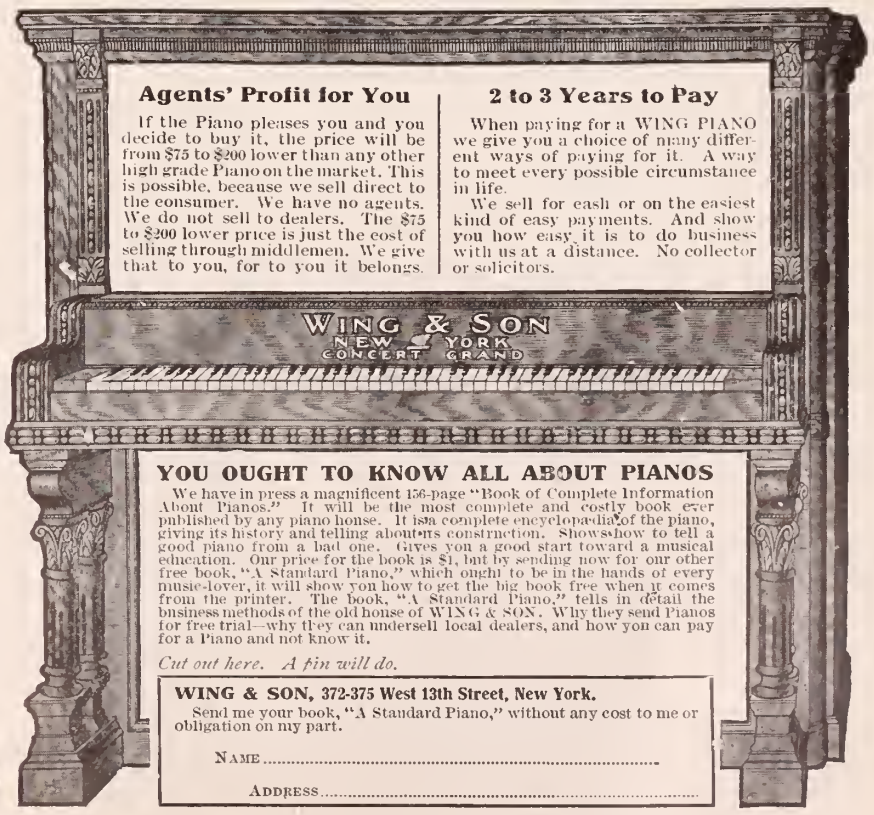
We Pay Freight Both Ways

A Beautiful Toned High Grade Piano on Easy Payments

In 41 years we have built and sold over 40,000 WING PIANOS. All this experience goes into the WING PIANO of to-day, and makes it as high a grade Piano as you can buy. Thousands of customers yearly write us of the tone and durability of their WING PIANO.

Four Weeks' Free Trial. Some pianos sound well in the warerooms but are a disappointment in the home. WING PIANOS keep their purity and power anywhere; that is why we make the unusual offer of sending you one for 4 weeks on trial in your own home without payment or deposit. You can be the judge of it in the place in which it must be used. We pay freight both ways, if after a 4 weeks' trial you decide not to buy.



Agents' Profit for You
If the Piano pleases you and you decide to buy it, the price will be from $75 to $200 lower than any other high grade Piano on the market. This is possible, because we sell direct to the consumer. We have no agents. We do not sell to dealers. The $75 to $200 lower price is just the cost of selling through middlemen. We give that to you, for to you it belongs.
2 to 3 Years to Pay
When paying for a WING PIANO we give you a choice of many different ways of paying for it. A way to meet every possible circumstance in life.
We sell for cash or on the easiest kind of easy payments. And show you how easy it is to do business with us at a distance. No collector or solicitors.

The Ruin of Idleness

their living. They were anxious to do some effective work for the Master. What should it be?

A source of difficulty in deciding a matter of this kind is that, in order to be really useful, one should pursue one's line of labor steadily. One must go regularly to one's school or office. Rain or shine, well or ill, one must perform the set task.

Few not absolutely obliged to do it will tie themselves down to the regular hours implied in taking up a steady occupation; but there are not many kinds of work in which this sort of binding down is not obligatory.

Be willing to sacrifice something in order to keep up an important line of endeavor. Not much that is worth while is done without pains and the enduring of "hardness."

Drummond, in his wonderful chapter on "Parasites," shows us vividly the way in which faculties which are not used gradually decay. The man who ceases to depend upon himself, but worms his living out of others, is a parasite. "Let the parasitic life once be secured," Drummond quotes from Lankester, "and away go legs, jaws, eyes and ears; the active, highly gifted crab, insect or annelid, may become a mere sac, absorbing nourishment. Any new set of conditions occurring to an animal, conditions which render its food and safety easily attainable, seem to lead, as a rule, to degeneration, just as an active, healthy man sometimes degenerates when he becomes suddenly possessed of a fortune; or as Rome degenerated when possessed of the riches of the ancient world. The habit of parasitism clearly acts in this way."

We all know that the physical health often suffers when a man drops industry for idleness. The human frame was meant for activity. It cannot be slothful and at the same time prosper.

This is conclusively proven by the prevalence of that strange, new disease known as "hookworm." Every one realizes that the climate in many parts of the world is not conducive to industry; but the presence of this disorder indicates that that disinclination must be shaken off if the race is to survive there. Dr. W. C. Stiles, of the Federal Marine Service at Washington, declares that 2,000,000 persons in our American States are afflicted with hookworm. He calls it "the lazy man's disease," "the American murderer," and says that in China it causes widespread disturbance of the mental and bodily functions. Intellectual dulness and dangerous inflation of the body follow in the train of this singular disease, which probably springs from indigestion, and causes, as well as feeds upon, laziness. The fear of it should incite everybody to active industry.

The story of the unhappy virgins is a warning against procrastination equally with idleness. We should not only work, but we should do our work promptly.

A Reader's Impression

—A LADY READER, who lives in St. Nicholas Avenue, New York City, after attending a service at the Bowery Mission during "Dedication Week," wrote us this cheering note, which is a fair sample of many others we are now receiving from friends of this soul-and-body saving institution: "I had the very great pleasure of attending a service at the Bowery Mission. I had always supposed that, in mission work, the expenditure of labor and money was out of all proportion to the returns, and should have said that probably the main good accomplished was to the workers themselves. But that morning service was a revelation to me, and if only half I saw and heard were true then the Bowery Mission is a wonderful investment. There was no collection, and I was told to send my contribution for the work to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I enclose $5."

DURING SLEEP

Nature Repairs the Human Engine.

The activities of the day cause more or less waste of tissues in the human engine, which is repaired at night during sleep.

The man or woman who can sleep well at night, is sure of the necessary repairs, other things being right, to make each day a time of usefulness and living a real joy.

But let insomnia get hold of you, and the struggle begins, of trying to work with a machine out of repair. A Nebr. woman's experience with coffee as a producer of insomnia is interesting. She says:

"I used to be a coffee drinker and was so nervous I could not sleep at night before about 12 o'clock, unless I would take some medicine. I was under the doctor's care for about 5 years and my weight got down to 82 pounds.

"The doctor said I would have to quit drinking coffee. Then my father got me to try Postum which he said had done wonders for him. I am past 43, and before I quit drinking coffee, my heart would jump and flutter at times, miss a beat, then beat so fast I could hardly breathe in enough air and I would get smothered.

"My tongue would get so stiff I could not talk and I could not hold a glass to drink from. Since I have been drinking Postum, in place of coffee, I can sleep sound any time I lie down, and I feel I owe everything to Postum. I now weigh 120 pounds and am well."

Gipsy Smith's Chicago Meetings

THE evangelist spoke each night at the Armory, and at least once a day at other points in the city and the suburbs. It is estimated, says a writer in the Chicago Standard, that not far from 10,000 people every day heard the evangelist throughout October. Many of the meetings, especially on Sunday, drew crowds that could not be accommodated at times, as many people being turned away from the Armory as were able to enter. At other times, a double service was conducted during the evening, the audience which packed the Armory for the first service being dismissed, and replaced by an equally large audience for the second service.

The $20,000 spent in connection with the conduct of the meetings is worthy of mention. Gipsy Smith gets none of it, his small salary being paid by the committee of the Free Church Council of Great Britain. The number of converts, judging from reports given through the press, and judging from the number of those who entered the inquiry room from day to day, seems to have been large. But it is probable that many of these were professed Christians or members of churches, and some who signed cards probably did not understand their import. So far as the actual additions to the churches have been recorded there is no evidence of a great ingathering. It yet remains to be seen how many of those who claimed to be converts of the meetings will identify themselves with the churches.

Gipsy Smith is a man of rare tact and good judgment and is pronounced, even by the secular press, to be an evangelical, orthodox preacher. His preaching was of a character to appeal to the heart rather than to arouse criticism, and it is seen that the Gospel still has power to stir a great city. In many respects, these services during the past season may be regarded as the greatest religious movement that has been conducted in Chicago.

How Cromwell Met Death

MANY biographers have written of Oliver Cromwell, but none have given us such a characteristic vision of his death-bed as the following from the British Weekly:

Cromwell spoke much of the Covenants. "Children, live like Christians: I leave you 'the Covenant to feed upon!' Yea, my brave one; even so! The Covenant, and eternal soul of Covenants remains sure to all the faithful; deeper than the foundations of this world; earlier than they, and more lasting than they!" Again: "All the promises of God are in him; yea in him, Amen; to the glory of God by us—by us in Jesus Christ." So the heavy days passed till, on Monday, August 30, "there roared and howled all day a mighty storm of wind." On the night of that stormy Monday the dying Oliver was heard praying, "Pardon such as desire to trample upon the dust of a poor worm, for they are Thy people, too." On Thursday night he used "divers holy expressions," implying much inward consolation and peace. On Friday, September 3, 1658, he was speechless, and between three and four in the afternoon he lay dead.

Delighted With Her Bible

Mrs. J. G. Ullrick, Carson City, Nev., writes: "I received the Bible in good order, and as requested write to tell you what I think of it, only I have not words to express my delight. I do not see how you can send out such Bibles for the money. I read so many things in your paper about needed help—and I want to help—that I studied a while whether I had better send for it or send the money for something else. Of course I had a Bible, but a very old one; it has no concordance, and I very much needed a concordance Bible. This new Bible is just what I wanted."

"We're Glad it's That."

GIVING AND LIVING*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE apostle Paul wrote the second letter to the Christians in Corinth when he was in Macedonia, in the autumn of A.D. 57. One of the chief reasons for writing the letter was to remind them of the promise they had made a year before to send to him a gift of money for the Christians in the church at Jerusalem. In almost every place Paul went he requested a similar gift, for the Christians in Jerusalem were poor because of social persecutions by the Jews; because there were many claims upon their Christian hospitality, and because they supported many Christian teachers, including the apostles. The church in Jerusalem was the mother of them all. Some of the Christians in Macedonia were about to visit the Corinthians, and Paul was much concerned that the good report he had given of the Corinthian Church should be confirmed by the Macedonian visitors. And he used this consideration as a means of hurrying them up to complete the benevolent collection they had begun a year ago to gather. He also refers in his letter to the "riches of the liberality out of deep poverty" contributed by the Macedonian Christians to the Jerusalem Christians as an incentive to the Corinthian Christians to be liberal givers also. It was Paul's purpose to establish a brotherhood among all of the churches organized by him, and to bind them together by a chain of helpfulness, whose links were of copper and silver coins, with sometimes a golden-coin link.

The Manner of the Gift

Paul wrote the Corinthians:

1. It must be of their own accord; they must be willing givers.

2. They must first give themselves to the Lord: they must be consecrated givers.

3. They must be generous givers, their gifts corresponding with their knowledge of the Gospel and their earnestness in the Christian life.

4. They must remember the Lord Jesus in their giving, and give like him, who became poor that others might become rich in love and grace.

And that in so giving their own want of rich spiritual blessing would be met.

The spirit of Paul is in the pastors of to-day. Witness some of the prayers made by them in receiving for the Lord the offerings made by the people.

O God, the Giver! teach us life's deep lesson, that we save only what we give,

All things come of thee, O Lord, and of thine own have we given thee. Amen.

O thou who wast rich, yet for our sakes didst became poor that we through thy poverty might become rich, accept, we pray thee, this tribute of love and longing for the things which are dear to thee. As giving doth not impoverish, nor withholding enrich thee, may we, thy unworthy followers, learn that profound truth; while we handle the things which perish, may we count all things to be loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ, and delight to publish thy name, and to build up and strengthen thy kingdom everywhere among those for whom thou hast died.

O Master, who didst sit over against the treasury, not to scan gifts, but to read the hearts of the givers, make our hearts so one with thine that it shall be our joy to give of all that we have and are to the service of the Father's house.

We may not know what were the sacrifices made by the Corinthian Christians to make up the gift requested by Paul, but we do know that such gifts always require sacrifices.

It has been said of John Wesley that "his liberality knew no bounds but an empty pocketbook." When he had a salary of $150 a year, he lived on $140 and gave away $10; when he received $300 a year he still lived on $140 and gave away $160. It is estimated that in his ministry he gave away more than $1,500,000.

Quite in contrast with this is the following: In a certain parish they were raising money for refurnishing the church. The colored sexton remarked of a certain well-to-do farmer having a reputation for close-fistedness, that he was "as stingy as old Cæsar." "Why do you think Cæsar was stingy?" was asked. "Well, you see," came the reply, "when the Pharisees gave our Lord a penny, Jesus asked them, 'Whose subscription is this?' and they said 'Cæsar's.'"

Of similar measure was Louis XI., who once made a donation of the whole county of Boulogne to "the Blessed Virgin," a deed being drawn up in due form, signed, sealed and delivered to the officers of the church. But he kept the whole of the revenues to himself!

Ben Adam had a golden coin one day,
Which he put out at interest with a Jew.
Year after year, awaiting him it lay,
Until the double coin two pieces grew,
And these two, four—so on, till people said,
"How rich Ben Adam is!" and bowed the servile head.

Ben Selim had a golden coin that day,
Which to a stranger asking alms he gave,
Who went rejoicing on his unknown way.
But Selim died, too poor to own a grave;
But when his soul reached heaven, angels with pride
Showed him the wealth to which his coin had multiplied.

The question may well be raised if, in teaching the little children of the primary classes in our Sunday Schools to sing "Hear the pennies dropping," we are not teaching quite the opposite of Christian benevolence. We should judge that in a certain congregation, where seventeen hundred pennies were counted in the collections for one Sabbath, there must have been a good many folks who had been taught that song in their childhood. The minister commented upon the gift on the following Sabbath, remarking: "This scheme of giving all the pennies to the church is hardly fair to the newsboys. You gentlemen start downtown Monday morning with nothing but dimes, quarters and bills in your pockets. As a result the newsboys are forced to lose time and expend profitless energy in making change. It would be infinitely better if you would save your pennies for the boys and drop your silver in the collection basket." This injunction formed a part of a sermon which the minister preached on the text, "Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil" (II. Tim. 4:14). It is needless to say there were few coppers in the collection baskets afterward.

Children can be trained to large giving in Christian benevolence. A little girl, not over eight years of age, was filled with a desire to raise a sum for the Foreign Missionary Society. She began by a determination to ask several people to give her a sixpence (twelve cents) each. She asked her mother for a form of receipt, which she could copy. She wrote, "Received the sum of sixpence for Wesleyan Foreign Missions," putting her own name at the bottom, also the text: "How much owest thou my Lord?" And then she made ten copies to be signed. When her father came home to dinner, she showed him what she had done and asked his opinion. "This is not right," said he, if they owe anything else; and from the text at the bottom it appears that they do. You should have put in, 'Received on account'—that means it is only a part of what they owe. Don't you think you had better write them again?" And so she did, and then went out with her ten copies. She called at a shop, and asked the young man at the counter, "Please would you like to have one of my receipts? They are only sixpence each, and I have written them all myself. You will have one, won't you?" She held up one of the pieces of paper, and looked eagerly and expectantly into the young man's face. "Yes, I will," he said, "and I hope you may sell all of the others." He handed her the sixpence, and took the receipt. She went on her way rejoicing, and, after calling at several places, she ran home, and told her mother, "I have sold them all!" Years passed away, and a returned missionary told the following story in the very town where the little girl had lived. He said: "I am particularly interested in being here tonight, for it was when I was a shop assistant, several years ago, that I dedicated myself to the cause of Christ and foreign missions. It was in this way: a little girl entered the shop and asked me to buy a receipt in her own handwriting, for sixpence. She looked so happy and so hopeful I did not like to disappoint her. So I paid the sixpence and became the possessor of the receipt, which I now reckon as one of my great treasures." Then he held up the bit of paper, and read out the contents: "Received, on account, the sum of sixpence for Wesleyan Foreign Missions. Signed, ——. 'How much owest thou my Lord?'" "On the days that followed 'Received on account' and 'How much owest thou?' kept ringing in my ears, and when Sabbath came I visited the Wesleyan Chapel, and there heard a sermon on the text, 'Pay me that thou owest.' My whole attention was riveted on the minister, and I wondered, as he talked about the great debt we owe to God, if he had heard about the 'receipt on account' which I had signed. After the service I went home, and fell on my knees and dedicated my life to Christ. And that is how I became a missionary."

At the close of the meeting a young lady, with tears in her eyes, went up to the missionary and shook hands with him. She was the little girl of years ago.—From At Home and Abroad.

Christian Giving Leads to Christian Brotherhood

A capitalist in Boston, on his seventieth birthday, made a gift of $5,000 for the perpetual endowment of a free bed in the Massachusetts General Hospital. And now any employee in his company, who may be ill, is entitled to all of the advantages in that institution. Another gentlemen celebrated his wedding anniversary by paying the cost of one trip of a floating hospital. But this is the sort of a thing a child may have a share in. On that same floating hospital a ragged Italian boy, with a violin, was permitted to go with the boat and play. After he had played a while, he took his brimless hat and went around for pennies. But none were given him. Angry and disappointed, he complained of the "stingy people" to the manager, who explained to him that they were all poor people like himself, and that kind people were paying for their trips that the sick mothers and babies might be made well. The heart of the boy was touched, and he went and sat down and began to play on his violin the sweetest he knew how. And many sick ones gathered around him to listen and their faces grew happier. All summer long he went on excursion after excursion on the floating hospital. He never passed his hat again on that ship, nor asked any one for money. He had found out, though poor, he could do something for others, and that was his greatest reward. He had entered into the joy of brotherhood.

No one could tell me where my soul might be,
I searched for God, but God eluded me.
I sought my brother out, and found all three.
ERNEST CROSBY.

The time draws near to the glad Christmas time of peace on earth, good will to men. "It would be lovely if we could support a missionary," said Mabel Harris to her sister. "Indeed it would, but really I have no more money to give," was the reply. "Perhaps we might earn some money, or deny ourselves something," said Mabel. Two days later the two sisters stood in front of a store window looking at a picture of little carol singers. "Don't they look sweet?" said Mabel. "They do," replied Alice, "and I had just been thinking I would buy it, but then I thought I would put the money into the missionary-box instead." "I have it," said Mabel, "you and I can earn something by carol singing. We can get two or three to help us, and there is yet time before Christmas to learn some carols." "It is a lovely thought, said Alice, "though I feel a little shy about singing, but I am sure we can get four of our friends to help us." And so they did. The first Christmas they received fifteen dollars and a half for singing carols in churches and at the homes of their friends, which amount they gave to the support of a missionary. The next Christmas they earned more than $30. And so it went on increasing year after year, and all they earned in that way was given for the missionary. "Just think!" said Mabel; "it is all the result of seeing a picture of little children singing Christmas carols." "You must not forget that God's blessing was on it," replied Alice.

The Ties of Brotherhood

The ties of brotherhood were strengthened between the churches in Asia and in Europe by the gifts which they sent through Paul to the church in Jerusalem. It is a natural law that the heart follows the gift. We may give without love in the first instance, but loving is sure to follow the giving.

Let us think of brotherhood as an arch, with Christ as the keystone. Indeed, we might draw such an arch on the blackboard, or on a piece of paper, and write on the stones the various forms of benevolence developed through Christian brotherhood. We should, probably, name the stones quite differently, according to our experience and observation, but there would be sure to be in all arches some stones marked Home Missions, Foreign Missions, Relief, Rescue Work, etc. Dr. Guthrie once said: "Piety toward God is the true parent of pity toward man—if imbued with the Spirit of Jesus. The sight of a fellow-creature suffering, and by the mouth of every wound imploring help, transforms me into a good Samaritan. Nature as well as grace has her claims; and they must adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour, whose benevolence, irrespective of creed, color, country, or even character, rises like the sun and falls like the sunshine upon all." There is a pseudo brotherhood which does not put the name of Christ on the keystone, but self instead. These so-called brotherhoods vary in name, but are communistic in character, and contain dynamite for their own destruction. Brotherhood in Christ alone can endure and bless.

The word brotherhood has taken on a new significance in recent years, since it has come to be largely applied to organizations of men in our churches and young men's classes in our Sunday Schools. In some instances it is called "The Brotherhood of the Kingdom," "The Laymen's Movement," "The Brotherhood of St. Andrew," "The Men's Movement," "Baraca," etc. Undoubtedly the church has done good work without "brotherhoods," but we believe it is now doing better work since the men of the church are brought into closer relationship with each other, for the purpose of uplift, enlightenment and helpfulness.

ARE YOU DEAF?

Aurophone in use. Practically invisible.

If your hearing is affected in any way or to any degree you are sure to find relief by using the lately perfected electrical hearing devices, the Aurophone and the Aurasage

The Aurophone is a powerful miniature electrical telephone which magnifies sound waves so that an affected ear may hear normally. The Aurasage by its action on the middle ear massages the ossicles so that the natural hearing may be restored. These two wonderful devices make possible the Successful Treatment of Deafness.

A Letter from One of Our Patrons.

MEARS EAR PHONE CO.—Gentlemen: After 30 years of deafness I have discarded my speaking tube, and no one would know that I have been deaf. Your instrument has restored my hearing. Words are inadequate to express my gratitude. H. R. FRENCH, 6844 Peoria Street, Chicago, Ill.

OUR FREE OFFER:

With every Aurophone sent out we will for the next ninety days, send the Aurasage without extra charge, which is to be used together with the Aurophone as long as you need it. The use of the Aurasage costs you nothing, and its use in conjunction with the Aurophone, is invaluable. Questions and Answers

Anonymous communications cannot receive attention in "Our Mail-Bag."

E. A., Hookstown, Pa. What had Miriam done that Jehovah smote her with leprosy?

Miriam's offense was that, fearing the loss of her influence and position, she made disloyal reflections upon Moses' authority (see Num. 12:1, 2). Aaron was also rebuked, but the chief punishment fell on Miriam, as the principal offender.

Mrs. E. M. P., Richmond, Va. 1. Who wrote the words "Leap at the stars and fasten in the mud"? 2. What are the grounds for some saying that Luke was not present at the Last Supper? 3. Does the ninety-first Psalm refer to all Christians? 4. Why did Virginia and West Virginia separate, and when? 5. What book can I get to teach the names of the constellations and stars?

1. Author unknown. 2. Luke was not one of the twelve. He says himself that he was "not an eye-witness and minister of the Word from the beginning" (Luke 1:2). He probably joined Paul at Antioch as an evangelistic associate, having become a proselyte some time before. 3. It refers to godly men and the divine protection and blessings with which they are surrounded. 4. Up to the Civil War, West Virginia was a part of Virginia. The majority of the people in what is now West Virginia were loyal to the Union, and in 1861, at the second Wheeling convention, adopted a declaration of rights, organized a State government and elected a Governor. The ordinance for a new State was submitted to popular vote, and passed 18,408 to 781. Congress admitted West Virginia to the Union June 20, 1863. 5. One of the best is The Elements of Descriptive Astronomy, published by Silver, Burdett & Co., New York, Chicago and Boston. Price $1.25.

R. M. B., Macon, Ga. Does science give any recognition to the theory of the effect of the moon on plants and animals?

Yes, in a certain sense it does. Some scientists hold that the moon has a twofold influence, i. e., in the waxing, or increasing, stage its influence on some kinds of plants and animals is beneficent, and in the waning stage the reverse. Professor Bailey, of the Agricultural College of Cornell University, writes on this subject in The Independent: "Animals born when the moon is new, or increasing, will be much more likely to thrive than those unfortunately born at the opposite period. In the new of the moon is the time to set hens, to plant corn and other things that grow above the ground. Planted in the old of the moon, seeds of such plants will probably rot. On the other hand, crops that grow under the ground, as potatoes and beets, should be planted in the old of the moon. Beans planted when the moon is on the wane will not cling to their poles." We are not prepared to say to what extent this is science, or simply conclusions drawn of experience and observation.

F. A. R., Maysville, W. Va. Please name ten of the most important dates, in order, of United States history.

The history of the United States, as a nation, does not properly begin until the Declaration of Independence; yet events of the first part of the Revolution are always included in such lists: Battle of Lexington and Concord, April 19, 1776; Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776; Surrender of Cornwallis, October 19, 1781; Washington inaugurated, March 4, 1789; war with Great Britain, 1812-15; Monroe Doctrine declared, December 2, 1823; war with Mexico, 1846; Civil War, 1861-65; Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, January 3, 1863; war with Spain, 1898; 1908, American battleship fleet makes trip around the world an effective declaration that the United States is a world power, with vast interests in distant countries and distant seas.

Munro, Brooklyn. 1. We believe that it is well for a person to abide with the Christian denomination in which he was brought up. Nothing is to be gained by change, for the mere sake of change. According to your own statement, you could work with equal enthusiasm in any one of the three churches. All other things being equal, why not then stick to your own denomination, unless it should happen that you do not live convenient to a

THE TIDE OF JOY RUNS HIGH

I.

What matter though the woods are bare,
And Winter lingers nigh?
In merry child-hearts everywhere
The tide of joy runs high.

II.

What matter though the days are brief?
There is no need to cry.
Strip from the corn its yellow sheaf;
The tide of joy runs high.

III.

The sun shines though the flowers have fled; golden the pumpkins lie;
Thanksgiving Day is just ahead—the tide of joy runs high.

church of that denomination? There is no essential difference in the creeds of those you mention. 2. Why we are Protestants can best be understood by reading a history of the Reformation, which you can find in any good encyclopedia. This answer applies practically to all of the other questions on your list.

R. B. L., Michigan. What church does Vice-President Sherman attend?

In Utica, N. Y., his home city, he attends the Dutch Reformed Church.

J. C. A., Brooklyn, N. Y. 1. Why is it that innocent children must suffer for the sins of the father? Why should they be made to suffer for sins for which they are in no way responsible? I can understand why the father should suffer the natural consequence of his own sinning, but I fail to see why his innocent children should pay the penalty. Is this just? 2. This being so, should "the children" become disheartened, give up hope, and yield to these discouraging conditions? 3. Referring to Heb. 2:10, does it take suffering to make perfect?

1 and 2. This particular passage is often misunderstood and misinterpreted. The denunciation in Ex. 20:5 does not refer to physical evils, arising from the sins of progenitors, although it is a well-known fact that these, too, through the inflexible law of nature, are visited upon the helpless and innocent. It has a special reference to idolatry. Under the Jewish law, as under all wise and equitable governments, fathers were not permitted to suffer for the children's sins, nor the children for the fathers' offenses, but every one should suffer for his own sin. In the case of idolatry, however, it would seem that God appropriated to himself the execution of his own law, which was designed to discourage that special sin. National rewards and punishments seem inevitably to extend over a single generation, in order to produce any permanent effect. 3. "Perfect" here means to bring to a consummation or to a completed work. The perfection of Christ's consecration to the work of redemption was reached when he himself exclaimed on the cross, "It is finished!"

J. L., South Dakota. In Acts 26-32, Agrippa said to Festus that Paul might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed to Cæsar. Did Paul have to go to Cæsar or could he withdraw his plea and be set at liberty by Agrippa?

After the appeal to the imperial court at Rome (to which Paul had a right as a Roman citizen), the governor had no alternative, as the appeal removed the case from his jurisdiction. It was in the power of the Roman governor to have set Paul at liberty if he saw fit, and he intimated this in verse 32; but the appeal compelled him to retain Paul as a prisoner to be delivered at Rome. Paul, no doubt, believed he would not receive justice if tried in Jerusalem or anywhere in Judea.

Dr. J. R. Harwell, Nashville, Tenn., writes: President James E. Polk's wife was a Presbyterian, but he belonged to no church. On his deathbed he was baptized into the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, by the Rev. J. B. McFerrin, D.D., who was for many years editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate. Mr. Polk's name was enrolled on the register of McKendree Methodist Church of Nashville. Many of his family connections were Episcopalians. Bishop Polk, of Louisiana, of Confederate fame, was a Bishop of the Episcopal Church and a relative of President Polk."

Miss ——, Pasadena, Calif. I wish to engage in Christian work. I am the only daughter at home, and my father and mother do not encourage me to carry out my plan. They think that I should be contented with housework, feeding chickens, going to Christian Endeavor and teaching a Sunday School class. I have set my heart on being a foreign missionary, going into Settlement work, or else consecrating my powers in a definite line as a welfare worker, or something of that kind, for the honor of my Master. Is it not hard that my father and mother should interpose a barrier and insist on my remaining with them?

The question raised in this letter touches a vital point. If a daughter is needed at home by parents, who have the first claim upon her—if there is no one to take her place and assume her home responsibilities when she throws them down—then the urgent call for her is not to a mission field. Duty for her is plain. Parents who are growing old ought not to be abandoned that a daughter may become a welfare worker in another field. Jesus Christ can be as truly served by a girl in her own home, quietly fulfilling the obligations there, as by a missionary teacher on a foreign shore, or a Settlement worker in the tenement districts. Christian work is not of narrow definition. What our Lord demands is faithfulness wherever we happen to be. Teaching a Sunday School class in one's own town is as really Christian work as it would be if the class were in India or Japan.

J. C., Oxford, O. In looking over my scrapbook, I find an extract from a letter written by Admiral Farragut to his wife, the night before the battle of Mobile Bay, which I send you, thinking it may be new to many of your readers, as it gives us a glimpse of the true inwardness of that noble hero and Christian soldier:

"My Dearest Wife: I write and leave this letter for you. I am going into Mobile Bay in the morning. If God is my leader, and I hope he is, and in him I place my trust—if he thinks it is the proper place for me to die, I am ready to submit to his will in that, as in all other things. God bless and preserve you, my darling, and my dear boy, if anything should happen to me."

I. F. N., Pueblo, Colo. Please explain Matt. 24:3, also verse 34. In the latter verse, was Christ foretelling what would happen before or at the time of his crucifixion, or what should take place at the end of the world?

This was the discourse which closed His public ministry, and he spoke of things that should happen shortly after he had passed from earth, and also of later events. He had just foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, and then, looking farther into the future, he foreshadowed the convulsions which rent the Roman world and the disasters which were to be "the beginnings of sorrows." The prophecy had no special reference to the end of the world.

Mrs. A. T. W., Winsted, Conn. "New Thought," as far as we can make it out from the publications of the cult, is a strange sort of spiritual make-believe. In some respects it approaches pantheism. It holds that everyone is divine, and that by concentration of purpose and the persistent use of optimism, anything may be accomplished. It has no philosophic or theological basis.

Miscellaneous

Reader (State not given). We pay no attention to anonymous letters.

Reader, Texas. There is no law forbidding the marriage of second cousins; but such unions are regarded by scientific authorities as inadvisable.

M. H., Batesville, Tex. You will find all the known facts regarding the assassination of Lincoln in any good American history, which you can consult at the nearest library.

A. S. T., Maryland. Any book or encyclopedia article upon "Communistic Settlement" should give you the information that you want. The poem that you ask for cannot be found in our collections.

C. B. T., Rutland, Vt. 1. We do not know what the intentions are regarding sepulture in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. 2. A person who rejected the doctrines you mention (and who believed practically in universalism) would probably be rejected by the church.

D. H. B., Hanover, Pa. 1. The names of those who accompanied Peter to Cæsarea are not given. 2. Josephus in Antiquities, Book 20, Chapters 7 and 8, mentions Emesa, but without stating its location. It was possibly identical with Edessa, in Armenia. 3. See explanation of Gentiles, in a recent issue of THE MAIL-BAG.

E. B. J., Topeka, Kan. 1. The Shorthand Correspondence Course mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives a thorough training in the Graham-Pitman, equipping the student for practical office work. The $2 covers all charges.

Apropos of a recent letter in THE MAIL-BAG, Mrs. E. S. L., Fort William, Ontario, writes: "H. B. W., Boston, says Christian Scientists wish her to give up her church and come and join them. Scientists respect all churches, especially orthodox churches, as most of us were believers in those churches and still love and respect them, and we are not trying to draw their members away."

Distressed, Remington, Va. One who is in the condition you describe is not responsible. We can set no limits to God's mercy and love, which the Bible assures us are boundless. He is kinder and more forgiving than we think, and if we ask him, for his Son's sake, he will save to the uttermost. No truly repentant one need ever fear that he will refuse to listen to a penitent appeal.

An Important Decision

THE United States District Court of Appeals has handed down a decision that President Samuel Gompers, Secretary Frank Morrison and Vice-President John Mitchell, of the American Federation of Labor, must serve jail terms for contempt of court. Chief Justice Sheppard dissented on constitutional grounds. The decision upheld the opinion of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in which the three men were found guilty of contempt in publishing the name of the Buck's Stove and Range Company, of St. Louis, in an unfair list after they had been forbidden to do so by injunction. Gompers was sentenced to twelve months in jail, Mitchell nine, and Morrison six. The court held that the fundamental issue was whether the constitutional agencies of government should be obeyed or defied.

"California Now or Never!"

"The Kuhn California Project" will irrigate 250,000 acres in the famous Sacramento Valley. The land is ready! The water is ready! Are you ready? The sale of these rich valley lands has just begun in tracts of 10 to 80 acres. Small payment down; then ten annual payments.

The valley is garden soil, 50 feet deep, yielding immense crops of fruit, alfalfa, sugar beets and all the famous products of California. Mature orange groves on these lands have yielded as high as $1,000 per acre. If you are going to have a farm, why not have the best? The Kuhns are always looking for the best, and their experts tell them in this enterprise they have found it. They are putting millions of dollars into improvements to make it still better. The land is close to big markets and will pay for itself.

You take no chance in buying land under the Kuhn projects. The Kuhn interests are irrigating 400,000 acres in the Twin Falls Country, Idaho. Their great Sacramento Valley project offers a frostless winter and a still wider range of crops. Organize a California Colony in your own city or town. Take your neighbors with you.

There is in press a very choice book of 48 pages, "California—Now or Never." It is by far the handsomest California book ever issued, and will show you at a glance whether you want a home ranch in California. To insure a select distribution, it is priced at ten cents. All other publications which are fully descriptive are free. Fill out the coupon below and mail. If you want the new book, enclose ten cents for each copy.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Temptations of Dot

Dot. By L. M. Zimmerman, D.D. The author of this book has given a truthful portraiture of Christian girlhood. His characters are real, subjected to the temptations that come to all in every-day life. What these temptations were and how the heroine was able to overcome them are interestingly told in the pages of this book. We believe the reader will find Dot's young life was strong in influence for good, and that the hero is the best type of progressive American manhood. The book well sets forth the hideousness of vice, the worth of virtue, the kindliness of charity, the strength of a mother's influence, and the holiness and sanctity of marriage. The illustrations embellishing the pages are artistic, quite in keeping with the excellent taste of the author. Most of all, it is to be commended for its high moral tone, which is pure without being prudish. It is a book that will counteract the evil influences of many books of the day. A copy might well be placed in every Sunday School library in our land, for the helpful influence it would exert over the older girls and boys. Cloth binding. Illustrated. Pp. 236. Price $1. Mayer & Thalheimer, Baltimore, publishers.

Temperance Women Meet at Omaha

By Mrs. Martha M. Allen

"I NEVER stood before an organization that did such a work for humanity." These were the opening words of the address delivered by ex-Governor Robert B. Glenn of North Carolina before an audience of 6,000 at the Sunday night meeting of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union in the Auditorium at Omaha, Neb., October 24. "When the W. C. T. U. of my State began to work for State prohibition," continued the speaker, "I said that I would help them rid the State of the saloon, for I considered the temperance issue to be above all other issues. I made one hundred and eight speeches in that prohibition campaign. Before coming here, I went to bakers, butchers, merchants and bankers, and inquired if prohibition—county, as we formerly had it, or State, as we now have it—had hurt business. In every case these men said business had been greatly helped by the abolition of the liquor traffic. Savings banks had doubled deposits. Reynolds had 5,000 men and boys on his payroll. When we had saloons, one-half of his paychecks came back endorsed by saloonkeepers. Now they come back endorsed by merchants. Formerly, many of the men were unfit for work on Mondays; now there is no such trouble."

Another interesting speaker at the convention was Hon. John Marshall, Assistant Attorney-General of Kansas. He said that the only trouble Kansas now has in enforcing her prohibition law is caused by the interstate commerce laws. The States have no control over interstate commerce, hence shipments of liquor may be made into prohibition territory. It is necessary to obtain from Congress some legislative relief from this situation.

Prominent women speakers were Mrs. Mary Harris Armour of Georgia, Mrs. E. L. Calkins of Michigan, Mrs. Lulu Shepard of Utah, Mrs. Atkins of Tennessee, Miss Ellen Stone of Bulgaria, and Mrs. Nellie Burger of Mexico. Mrs. Armour preached the convention sermon on Sunday afternoon, from the text, "Be filled with the Spirit."

Mrs. Armour's suggestion of a million dollars for a temperance campaign is worthy of serious thought by men with large funds at their disposal. A million has recently been given to devise means of relief from the hookworm disease, but the disease of alcoholism is far more widespread.

Mrs. Atkins of Tennessee described graphically the campaign for Statewide suppression of the liquor traffic in her State last year.

It seems clear from the reports of Southern temperance workers that the fight against the liquor traffic is proving a great blessing to the Christian Church in giving the people something heroic to do in God's service. Ordinary church work does not appeal strongly to manly young men, but an heroic effort against organized and powerful evil makes enlistment in the service of the church seem to be a thing worthy of the best in a man.

An important change affecting temperance work among young people was made at this convention in the consolidation of the Young Women's Branch and the Senior Loyal Temperance Legion. The new organization is to be known as the Young People's Branch of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. In it young men and young women will have equal rights as to office-holding. It is expected that the change will do much to advance temperance work among young people. The Junior Loyal Temperance Legion remains unchanged in its organization.

Called Higher

The Christian Herald prints as rapidly as possible notices sent to the "Called Higher" column, but on account of the great demands for space some time must necessarily elapse before their publication. A number we have been unable to print, as the writers did not give full name and address, and we cannot take the responsibility for their publication.

Mrs. Frank Beard passed away at her home in Oxford, Ia., June 30, 1909, at the age of fifty-seven years.

Mrs. W. E. Mateer, of Mosgrove, Pa., died recently, aged sixty years. She was a life-long member of St. Mark's Lutheran Church.

Mrs. Margaret Gates Wasson, of Plainfield, Mich., was called on February 18, 1909, to her eternal home, aged eighty-eight years and seven months. She was an active member of the Presbyterian Church, of which she was the last charter member. She had been a subscriber to The Christian Herald for many years, and was a frequent contributor to its many charities.

Mrs. A. Murat Willis died recently near Beaver, Okla., in her eighty-second year, and less than twelve months after the death of her husband, Achilla Murat Willis. She was a generous, Christian woman, and for years, whether in Virginia (her native State), Texas or Oklahoma, has contributed her mite to most of the good causes advocated by The Christian Herald. Especially dear to her heart was the Bowery Mission for the poor.

Mrs. Caroline J. Bridgman, of Clifton, Staten Island, N. Y., passed away recently. She was for the many years of a long life identified with many branches of religious and philanthropic work. One of the earliest members of the First Presbyterian Church of Staten Island, her life for 50 years centred there, but the limits of denominationalism did not at all limit her field of usefulness. She was one of six daughters born in Northampton, Mass., to Joseph Strong Kingsley.

This is the most compact, most complete, most convenient and most practical reference work for busy people who want concise facts and up-to-date information. It is much more than merely an encyclopedia—it's a complete reference library—the most modern of all reference works. It is so compact that it gives all the essential information of many large works in its eight octavo volumes. It has 303 subjects illustrated by colored plates; 167 by monotones; nearly 50 by colored charts, while hundreds of articles are illustrated by cuts in the text and is the only work that embraces:

A Complete Encyclopedia treating 35,000 subjects of general information, from the dawn of history down to the aeroplane, with a Biographical Dictionary of 6,000 names.

A Pronouncing Dictionary of 40,000 English words, excluding those which are merely technical—no word in general use is omitted.

A Topical Index of subject-groups alphabetically arranged, with numerous cross references, making the Cyclopedia a complete general Study Course equal to a college education. No other work has this feature.

A Gazetteer and Atlas covering the entire globe, with 96 colored maps and 25,000 names of places, with population and situation of each place.

A Chronological History showing at one glance, by means of a unique series of colored charts, every important historical event and the various epochs in human history.

A Statistical Record by charts, of the individual and comparative production of the world by countries, (in some cases, States of the Union) and essential information on every vital subject.

A Question Manual of 2,000 questions, with references to cyclopedia articles, which classifies its contents and makes it a university of self-education and self-betterment.

No other reference work is so comprehensive yet compact, so thorough yet so concise. It will encourage study in every household and give to every one who possesses it the key to the practical knowledge which is indeed the power that wins in the world today. It will help you to learn more and earn more. But we do not ask you to believe this merely on our say so. We ask you to

The Comfort of the Telephone

The Bell System has become the nervous system of the business and social world.

The comfort it affords the women in the homes of America cannot be measured.

Do you measure it in considering the value of your Bell telephone ?

The mother of children can find out where they are at any particular hour of the day—and how they are—even though their visits carry them to the country village or the city hundreds of miles away.

The husband on a trip talks from his hotel room to his wife at home.

There is a world of comfort in the knowledge that you can talk together at a moment's notice, wherever you may be.

The Bell telephone has a special value because it is everywhere—because at sight you feel a familiar acquaintance with a Bell instrument or a Bell sign.

There are over 4,000,000 Bell stations You cannot use them all, but from time to time you have a real vital need for one. Which one you cannot foretell.

There are six billion calls over the telephones of the Bell System every year.

Many of these are comforting calls from afar, calls whose actual money value can no more be reckoned than the value of the happiness which one man has and another man cannot buy.

The very existence of the Bell telephone service has its value to you, even at moments when you are not using it.

The Bell Long Distance service offers, ready recruited for your call, the largest body of active business men in the world. If you have a telephone, avail yourself of its long distance possibilities.

The highest type of public service can be achieved only by one policy, one system, universal service.

THE WASHERWOMAN'S SONG

IN a very humble cot,
In a rather quiet spot,
In the suds and in the soap
Worked a woman full of hope;
Working, singing, all alone,
In a sort of undertone,
"With a Saviour for a friend,
He will will keep me to the end."

Sometimes happening along,
I had heard the semi-song,
And I often used to smile
More in sympathy than guile;
But I never said a word
In regard to what I heard,
As she sang about her friend
Who would keep her to the end.

Not in sorrow nor in glee,
Working all day long was she,
As her children, three or four,
Played around her on the floor;
But in monotones the song
She was humming all day long,
"With the Saviour for a friend,
He will keep me to the end."

Just a trifle lonesome she,
Just as poor as poor could be,
But her spirits always rose
Like the bubbles in the clothes,
And though widowed and alone,
Cheered her with the monotone,
Of a Saviour and a friend,
Who would keep her to the end.

I have seen her rub and scrub
On the washboard in the tub,
While the baby sopped in suds,
Rolled and tumbled in the duds;
Or was paddling in the pools
With old scissors stuck in spools,
She still humming of her friend
Who would keep her to the end.

Human hopes and human creeds
Have their root in human needs;
And I would not wish to strip
From that washerwoman's lip
Any song that she can sing,
Any hope that song can bring,
For the woman has a friend
Who will keep her to the end.

Lincoln and the Saloon

SOME years ago, says a writer in Christian Work, at a Lincoln meeting, among the old soldiers of a Michigan city, one of the battle-worn veterans gave the following testimony: "We have heard what Lincoln has done for all of us; I want to tell what he did for me. I was a private in one of the Western regiments that arrived first in Washington after the call for 75,000. We were marching through the city, amid great crowds of cheering people, and then after going into camp were given leave to see the town.

"Like many others of our boys, the saloon or tavern was the first thing we hit. With my comrade I was just about to go into the door of one of these places when a hand was laid upon my arm, and, looking up, there was President Lincoln.

"I almost dropped with surprise and bashfulness, but he held out his hand, and as I took it he shook hands in strong Western fashion, and said: 'I don't like to see our uniform going into these places.' That was all he said. He turned immediately and walked away; and we passed on. We would not have gone into that tavern for all the wealth of Washington City.

"And this is what Abraham Lincoln did then and there for me: He fixed me so that whenever I go near a saloon, and in any way think of entering, his words and face come back to me. That experience has been a means of salvation to my life. To-day I hate the saloon, and have hated it ever since I heard those words from that great man."

Whose House?

G. Campbell Morgan says: "My father came into my house soon after I was married, and looked around. We showed him into every room, and then in his rough way he said to me: 'Yes, it is very nice; but nobody will know, walking through here, whether you belong to God or the devil.' I went through and looked at the rooms again, and I thought: 'He is quite right.' So we made up our minds straightway that there should be no room in our house, henceforth, that had not some message, by picture or wall text, for every corner, which should tell that we at any rate serve the King."—New York Christian Advocate.

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT
ANNOUNCEMENT

BEGINNING with the issue of December 8 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will inaugurate a Financial Department for the guidance of those of its subscribers who may wish to invest their savings in safe securities. This determination is not so much a matter of choice as of necessity, but it is so evidently the desire of our readers that we are glad to undertake it. Ever since the United States recovered from the recent financial depression THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received numbers of letters from subscribers asking for advice in the matter of investing their savings.

Some of these letters have shown lamentable unfamiliarity with the first principles of finance; others have revealed unconscious pathos because of dire possibilities involved in the event of the writer's little hoard being lost. Some, after stating an amount saved as the result of rigid economy, have asked the simple question: Where had it best be invested? Others, who had been solicited by investment brokers, have asked our opinion concerning their integrity. Still others, unaware that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD maintains a rigid censorship upon its advertising columns, have asked concerning the reliability of our own advertisers. But whatever the reason advanced, it would seem that a great number of its 250,000 subscribers look upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as a friend, whether in financial or other matters. And as this demand for information appears to be growing steadily, it would seem to be the duty of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to meet it half-way with a Department in which the elementary principles of investing may be outlined in the simplest manner possible.

Good and Bad Securities

This does not mean that we shall attempt to advise readers to invest in any particular security. The endeavor will be rather to indicate the kind of security to be accepted or avoided. There are certain laws of finance which seemingly are irrefutable. Occasionally there are exceptions, but these only serve after all to prove the rule, and, however tempting they may be, it is safer to adhere to the rule. This has been well illustrated in the character of Financial Advertisements in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is the rule of this Magazine to accept advertisements of securities only of a kind which long experience has proven to be reasonably safe, backed by the word of houses of the highest integrity. This, generally speaking, eliminates stock jobbing ads and narrows the field, for the most part, to bonds of safe interest.

Occasionally, however, we are offered advertisements of stocks of apparently the most gilt-edged character upon the assurance of houses of long established reputation. To accept them would be to break the rule which safeguards the interests of our readers, and it would establish a precedent whereby we might feel constrained to accept advertisements which, on the surface, would appear to be reputable, but which at bottom might be very, very questionable.

Leading Experts Will Co-operate

At the same time there will arise occasions when the exercise of our judgment must be the only determining factor in pointing our course, but we shall ever hew closely to the line. For the rest we shall have the co-operation of some of the leading experts of the financial world, and we shall avail ourselves of their advice on every possible occasion.

It is our intention to make this department, on the one hand, a primer on the subject of investing; on the other, a safeguard against the financial pirates and get-rich-quick swindlers, who are constantly on the lookout for the unwary. It follows, therefore, that the department cannot be used in any way as a "tipping sheet." We cannot recommend operations on margins, as these encourage gambling and ultimately entail loss. And we cannot undertake privately to advise concerning the reliability of certain securities. The most reputable financial houses will speak to you directly through our advertising columns, and we must refer you to them.

Broad Principles of Finance

So we shall endeavor to define the broad principles of finance for those of our readers who are not already acquainted with them, to expose the swindler in pursuit of the widow's mite and the orphan trust-fund, to the end that we may bring together, for their mutual benefit, the investor who wishes honestly to increase his or her little store and the reputable banker who can point out the way in which it may be accomplished.

THE "SUFFRAGETTE SLAP"

ARTHUR RUHL tells in Collier's Weekly of a notable incident in suffragette warfare in England: "It was a civil war the suffragettes were fighting—Mrs. Pankhurst left no doubt about that," he writes. "And scarcely entering the more debatable ground—whether the majority of women are ready to take the responsibilities of the vote as well as its privileges, not to speak of subtler difficulties—and sticking to this picturesque business of constitutional rights withheld, she stood on practically unassailable ground. Somebody sent up the question at a recent meeting: 'Have the suffragettes slapped policemen?' Mrs. Pankhurst answered very earnestly. Their last encounter with the police became so painful and embarrassing for all concerned, officers as well as the women—crowds were jeering and windows filled with opera-glasses—that she felt that it devolved upon her as leader to bring the incident to a close. So she stepped up to Lieutenant Jarvis and quietly and deliberately slapped him on the cheek. Said the inspector: 'Mrs. Pankhurst, I understand why you did that.' 'Yes,' said she, 'and I hope I shall not have to do it twice.' 'I am sorry,' said the courtly Jarvis, 'but you will.' Mrs. Pankhurst applied her hand to the other cheek, whereupon the delegation was quietly arrested. Whether or not the women were within their constitutional rights in this last attempt to petition their sovereign is a matter still to be decided. Mrs. Pankhurst's present visit to this country is merely a 'fighting holiday,' taken while the outcome of their suspended sentence is being decided in the higher courts. If it is decided against her, she will have to go to jail again on her return to England."

A Book of Facts About 6% Irrigation Bonds

We have written a book on Irrigation bonds, based on 15 years of experience. It is a conservative statement of the vital facts of which we have intimate knowledge.

It will give you a clear conception of these ideal securities, which are now the most popular bonds that we handle.

Every investor, small or large, owes to himself a knowledge of these facts. Please send for the book—it is free.

An Unbiased Book

We are very large dealers in all good classes of bonds—Municipal, Corporation and Public Utility. We can offer you the choice of scores of such issues, and we just as gladly supply them as we do Irrigation bonds. So our position is not at all biased.

But Irrigation bonds have in late years become the most popular bonds that we handle. They are becoming more popular as they become better known. The reasons mean much to every investor, and they are all told in this book.

71 Issues Sold

In the past 15 years we have sold 71 separate issues of Reclamation bonds—Drainage and Irrigation—without a dollar of loss to any investor. We are now the largest dealers in this class of bonds, so our book is based on ample experience.

We buy and sell Entire Issues of Reclamation bonds. Our own engineers and attorneys pass on every detail. An officer of our Company spends most of his time in the irrigated country, watching every project through to completion.

Being the largest dealers in Irrigation bonds, we have our pick of the issues. There are few projects of this kind, save Government projects, which we are not invited to finance. We are able, therefore, to supply our customers with the best of these securities, all based on well-located lands.

Farm Lien Security

Irrigation bonds are secured by first liens on the most fertile farm lands in America. The liens are given by individual land owners in payment for water rights. And the water immediately multiplies the land's value.

The liens are conservative. Usually they will not exceed one-fourth the land's value. The liens are paid off in ten annual installments.

The first crop from the land is frequently sufficient to pay the whole lien—often by several times over. These liens, therefore, have many advantages over the usual farm mortgage.

In addition, the bonds are secured by a first mortgage on all the property which the Irrigation Company owns, and which the proceeds of the bonds help to build and buy.

Some Irrigation bonds are municipal securities, issued by organized districts. Such bonds, like School bonds, form a tax lien on all the real property lying in populous districts.

Some Irrigation bonds are issued under all the provisions of the Federal law known as the "Carey Act."

In all the projects we finance the security is ample and ideal. One can scarcely conceive of anything better.

Six Per Cent

Irrigation bonds pay six per cent. interest. This is a larger rate than can now be obtained on any large class of bonds based on equal security.

This high rate is due to the fact that irrigation projects are profitable. The demand for irrigated land exceeds the supply. Many millions of dollars can be utilized at once in these projects, and this liberal rate is paid to obtain the funds.

$100—$500—$1,000

These are serial bonds, running from two to twelve years. So one may make long-time or short-time investments. Every bond paid off increases the security back of the rest.

The bonds are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, so they appeal to both small investors and large.

Our book deals with all these facts—and more. It is profusely illustrated. Every investor owes to himself its perusal. Please send this coupon to-day for it.

GOOD "3-IN-ONE" OIL

"3-in-One" is a perfect lubricant for all light machinery. It goes right into the contact point of all bearings, removes dirt, reduces friction, makes every action part work better and last longer. It will not dry out, cake, turn rancid or collect dust and is the only oil on earth that positively will not gum.

"3-in-One" cleans and polishes wood or metal surfaces and prevents rust in any climate or weather. This good oil is indispensable for a hundred uses about home, shop or office. Ask any good hardware dealer, druggist or general store. Try it yourself for:

Sewing Machines "3-in-One" lasts longer, costs less and lubricates better than any machine oil or cheap mineral oil. It won't turn rancid, gum, collect dust to soil the fabric. A little "3-in-One" will remove all dirt from the bearings and make the hand wheel, treadle, bobbin, foot, etc., of any machine, new or old, work exactly right. "3-in-One" saves time in sewing, saves the hard labor of pumping and expensive repair bills when the machine breaks down or parts wear out before they should. It's the best oil for any make of machine. Polishes the wooden case—prevents rust on all metal surfaces, particularly the nickel.

Typewriters "3-in-One" is just right for oiling all the delicate parts. It cuts away gum and grease, cleans the typefaces, prevents rust on all the metal and makes machine work faster and better. Your typewriter needs "3-in-One."

Guns "3-in-One" makes trigger, lock and every action part work easily, accurately and without hitch. It cleans and polishes the wooden stock, prevents rust on metal parts, removes residue of burnt powder (black or smokeless) and keeps barrels bright and shiny—inside and out. Preserves the wooden stock.

Furniture Every housewife needs "3-in-One" for cleaning and polishing chairs, tables, beds, hardwood trimmings, bathroom fixtures, etc. Has no disagreeable odor and contains no grease or acid to soil or injure. "3-in-One" is the best furniture polish sold—better than any varnish because it is not greasy or sticky. "3-in-One" is also best for razors, bicycles, fishing tackle, office fixtures, clocks, fans, talking machines, scales, tools, and many other things. You can't afford to be without this good oil.

Why Women Should Be Thankful

By KATE UPSON CLARK

THERE is something irritating to the average sensible woman in the cavalier manner in which wholesale accusations are brought against our sex. Edmund Burke's great dictum that "you cannot indict a whole nation" is even truer when translated into: "You cannot indict a whole sex."

In a recent magazine article, which has been widely quoted, we are told that young women are avoiding marriage; if married, they are determined not to have children; and that they no longer care to make themselves beautiful and attractive, but, in their mad chase after professional or political prominence, they do not take pains with their appearance.

And so on and so on.

All of these dreadful things may be true of a small body of exceptional and abnormal women. Most of us may have met a dozen or more of them during a long lifetime. But that such a bitter and universal stigma should be cast upon our sweet girls and noble women, is so utterly unjust that even the quietest and most amiable among us must be moved to protest.

To some of us—some who have had wide observation in many cities and villages; being entertained in scores and even hundreds of homes, and meeting girls and women of all classes; often chaperoning for days together large house-parties of girls; and knowing the modern girl in shops and factories, in schools and colleges, at home and abroad; to such women all of this talk of the unsexing of the modern woman and her transformation into an unnatural, home-hating, Amazonian creature, is so false and wicked, that it even seems as if those who construct such artful theories almost ought to be shut up in jail.

Are they doing it just to rouse indignation and to make us "talk back"? Do they simply seek notoriety for themselves? Or do they belong to that large section of society which is said to have a sort of strabismus, so that they never can "think clear and see straight"?

Very likely they fulfil all three of these conditions.

The fact is that, though nobody can generalize in a great nation like ours, this latest Thanksgiving Day should find the heart of every American woman overflowing with thankfulness for the mercies which crown her lot.

And no less should it find every good and noble American man (and the great majority of them, with all their surface faults, are good and noble) fervently thankful for the splendid women of America.

For there was never a time in the history of the world when women so loved the home, so longed for husband and children, and so desired to make them happy, as in this year of our Lord 1909.

Our girls need not marry merely for the sake of getting a good living for themselves or to maintain their social position. Our magnificent girls can nearly always earn a good living. Our system of common schools, our trade schools, our colleges, our art institutes, our conservatories of music—all these are fitting our girls to take care of themselves, and to know the independence of self-support.

But not one in a thousand among them is so enamored of self-support that she will not throw up her place in a minute, if the right man comes along.

Divorce, in these days, may attack and demolish almost any home; but it is most likely to enter that in which the woman has not married that "right man."

You don't want your daughter to marry any but the "right man"—devoted to her; upright and good himself as the girl you are giving to him; able to support her; and truly beloved by her. You don't want any other sort.

And when our fine girls get homes, and husbands whom they want to please, see if they will not make those homes and husbands happy.

None of the preceding generations can begin to show homes so charming as theirs will be.

Our women, when they get children, take good care of them. These same censorious critics, who find that our women neglect their children, paradoxically accuse them also of over-indulging those children, and of sinking their own individuality almost criminally in their devotion to their families!

As for the complaint that we are neglecting our looks, it should be answered in the old words of George William Curtis: "I am ashamed to argue a point so plain."

HOUSEHOLD LUBRICANT

Keep a can in the kitchen, another one upstairs, and then when things begin to rattle, and screech and sing—put a drop on the bearings. Household Lubricant is especially prepared for home use. Will not gum, corrode or injure the most delicate bearing. Use it wherever a lubricant is needed. Saves wear and tear. Prevents rust.

Mansions in the Sky

By M. J. Wilson

We do not know what the conditions of the after life may be; but this we, as Christians, do know: that we are assured of peace and rest and glory. The only way we have of viewing heaven is by symbolizing it to beauty in our own language. We may dwell in glittering mansions; but whether we take it literally or figuratively, we know in truth there is rest and reward awaiting us in the degree that we each deserve. Illustrating this I wish to relate a simple little story which an evangelist told me. It has been in my mind so constantly that I believe it should be told to others. He related it thus:

"A very wealthy society woman had a dream, which seemed so real to her that it afterward changed the entire course of her life. She dreamed that an angel came to her, and asked her if she would like to go up and look at heaven. Her curiosity at once prompted her to accept the invitation, and, guided by the angel, she was transported to heaven. At first the glory and light were so radiant that she could not look upon it all; but gradually her eyes became more used to the brightness, and she beheld such splendor as she had never dreamed or fancied.

"Up and down the golden streets she followed the angel, and finally she asked to see the throne of God. The angel told her the throne was placed in the centre of heaven, but that she could not see His glorious face, for none but the pure in heart could see God. She begged the angel for that privilege, and spoke of her position as a leader of American society.

"The angel told her she need not introduce herself in heaven, for she was already well known there, but her record alone would not permit her to look upon the glorious face of the King of heaven. Utterly crushed, she followed the guide through the streets, where she was allowed to pass. Everywhere she saw beautiful, shining mansions. Some were tall and built of gold and pearl and precious stones, while others were small and scarcely begun. Seeing one particularly beautiful mansion, she said to the angel, 'You may reserve this one for me, faithful guide.' The angel smiled and answered, 'You cannot choose another's mansion here; you must dwell in the one you yourself furnish. This one belongs to Hannah Laden, your servant.'

"The woman caught her breath and gasped, 'What can you mean? This grand palace belong to my common handmaiden?' 'Yes,' replied the angel; 'all day long she works for you faithfully, and endures your hard service with patience, and when alone she is always praying for your soul. At night, when her labors are done, she is out visiting the sick or reading to the aged and infirm from God's Word, and giving all she can spare from her wages to suffering humanity. Each prayer is a precious gem; each charity a layer of pearl; each act of mercy a pillar of gold, which we use in constructing her mansion.'

"The lady was silenced for a time; but finally her imperious nature asserted itself again, and she began to fancy that if this house could belong to humble Hannah Laden then there must be a palace somewhere in heaven awaiting her, and she asked to see it. The guide led her to a street where the houses were small, and, pointing to an unusually humble, unfinished dwelling, said, 'This one is yours.' She looked incredulously at the structure, and said, 'This one for me? Why, I can't believe it! Why is mine so small and rough?' The angel looked sad as he answered, 'Madam, we have used the material you have sent up for it. When you send more, we shall add to it, and of such material as you send shall your mansion be built.' And she left heaven a disgraced, sorrowing woman.

"After she awoke (the story goes) her dream filled her heart and mind, and she began life anew from that day. She has been sending up ever since such rich materials as will ensure her a glorious mansion in the sky. She has so purified her heart and life that when the real summons comes, and she is taken away, she will surely not be denied the happiness of looking upon the glorious Face she so desired to see."

This is only a dream, but it contains a lesson so great and so inspiring that I feel it will help others and spur them on to a life of purity, faith and good deeds, and thus to send up rich material for their own "mansions in the sky."

Laborers in the Vineyard

—Missionary A. S. Paynter, of Mahagastotta, Niwera Eliya, Ceylon, writes that the work there has been cheered by over two hundred conversions. One native convert, named Prakasam, has been leading others into the light. Previous to his conversion, he had charge of four Hindu temples. One day a visitor left a Bible behind him; Prakasam read it, and was converted. There is great need of more workers in this large and promising field.

—The Harmony Club of America—a new organization— held the first Harmony meeting November 12 in Carnegie Lyceum, New York City. Among the speakers announced were Bishop Samuel Fallows, of Chicago, on "The World's Need of Harmony"; Edward Earle Purinton, on "Harmonizing One's Self," and Edward H. Fallows on "The Harmony Club." The club has about 600 members in Greater New York and vicinity.

—Missionary F. A. Price, Wissika Mission, Liberia, writes that a threefold work—industrial, educational and religious—is in progress there. There is a fine forest nearby, affording abundant timber for building and cabinet-making. The soil is rich and productive. Heathen parents are all eager to have their children "learn sense," and send them to school and to work. The mission is now caring for forty children, and the missionaries have hopes that some of these may become native evangelists. Support for native workers is greatly needed.
